New Series, I

BEADLE'S

No. 404.

Name 10 1218

Sheet-Anchor Tom.

Popular Dime Hand-Books.

BEADLE AND ADAMS, PUBLISHERS, NEW YORK.

Each volume 100 12mo. pages, sent post-paid on receipt of price-ten cents cuch.

STANDARD SCHOOL SERIES.

DIME SPEAKERS.

1. Dime American Speaker.

2. Dime National Speaker.

3. Dime Patriotic Speaker.

4. Dime Comic Speaker.

5. Dime Elocutionist.

6. Dime Humorous Speaker.

7. Dime Standard Speaker.

8. Dime Stump Speaker.

9. Dime Juvenile Speaker.

10. Dime Spread-eagle Speaker.

11. Dime Debater and Chairman's Guide.

12. Dime Exhibition Speaker.

13. Dime School Speaker.

14. Dime Ludicrous Speaker.

15. Carl Pretzel's Komikal Speaker.

16. Dime Youth's Speaker.

17. Dime Eloquent Speaker.

18. Dime Hail Columbia Speaker.

19. Dime Serio-Comic Speaker.

20. Dime Select Speaker.

Dime Melodist. (Music and Words.) School Melodist. (Music and Words.) DIME DIALOGUES.

Dime Dialogues Number Oue.

Dime Dialogues Number Two.

Dime Dialogues Number Three.

Dime Dialogues Number Four.

Dime Dialogues, Number Five.

Dime Dialogues Number Six.

Dime Dialogues Number Seven.

Dime Dialogues Number Eight.

Dime Dialogues Number Nine.

Dime Dialogues Number Ten.

Dime Dialogues Number Eleven.

Dime Dialogues Number Twelve.

Dime Dialogues Number Thirteen.

Dime Dialogues Number Fourteen.

Dime Dialogues Number Fifteen.

Dime Dialogues Number Sixteen.

Dime Dialogues Number Seventeen.

Dima Dialogues Number Sevenice

Dime Dialogues Number Lighteen.

Dime Dialogues Number Nineteen. Dime Dialogues Number Twenty.

Dime Dialogues Number Twenty-one.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S SERIES.

1-DIME GENTS' LETTER-WRITER-Embracing Forms, Models, Suggestions and Rules for the use of all classes, on all occasions.

2-DIME BOOK OF ETIQUETTE—For Ladies and Gentlemen: being a Guide to True Gentility and Good-Breeding, and a Directory to the Usages of society.

3 DIME BOOK OF VERSES-Comprising Verses for Valentines, Mottoes, Couplets, St. Valentine Verses, Bridal and Marriage Verses, Verses of Love, etc.

4-DIME BOOK OF DREAMS-Their Roman ce and Mystery; with a complete interpreting Dictionary. Compiled from the most accredited sources.

5-DIME FORTUNE-TELLER-Comprising the art of Fortune-Telling, how to read Character, etc.

6-DIME LADIES' LETTER-WRITER-Giving the various forms of Letters of School Days, Love and Friendship, of Society, etc.

7-DIME LOVERS' CASKET-A Treatise and Guide to Friendship, Love, Courtship and Marriage. Embracing also a complete Floral Dictionary, etc.

8-DIME BALL-ROOM COMPANION-And Guide to Dancing. Giving rules of Etiquette, hints on Private Parties, toilettes for the Ball-room, etc.

9-BOOK OF 100 GAMES-Out-door and In-door SUMMER GAMES for Tourists and Families in the Country, Picnics, etc., comprising 100 Games, Forfeits, etc.

10-DIME CHESS INSTRUCTOR-A complete hand-book of instruction, giving the entertaining mysteries of this most interesting and fascinating of games.

11-DIME BOOK OF CROQUET-A complete guide to the game, with the latest rules, diagrams, Croquet Dictionary, Parlor Croquet, etc.

12-DIME BOOK OF BEAUTY-A delightful book, full of interesting information. It deserves a place in the hands of every one who would be beautiful.

DIME ROBINSON CRUSOE-In large octavo, double columns, illustrated.

FAMILY SERIES.

1. DIME COOK BOOK.

2. DIME RECIPE BOOK.

8. DIME HOUSEWIFE'S MANUAL.

4. DIME FAMILY PHYSICIAN. 5. DIME DRESSMAKING AND MIL-LINERY.

The above books are sold by Newsdealers everywhere, or will be sent, postpaid, to any address, on receipt of price, 10 cents each. BEADLE & ADAMS, Publishers, 98 William Street, New York.

SHEET-ANCHOR TOM;

OR,

THE SUNKEN TREASURE.

derived accounting to Act of Congress, in the year and the top of

In the Center Other of the District Page of the Telephone of

BY ROGER STARBUCK,

AUTHOR OF THE FOLLOWING DIME NOVELS:

371 FOUL-WEATHER JACK. 390 SHADOW JACK.
379 THE PHANTOM SHIP. 395 BLUE ANCHOR.
383 THE SPECTER SHIP. 401 THE ICE FIEND.

BEADLE AND ADAMS, PUBLISHERS, 98 WILLIAM STREET.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the year 1967, by

BEADLE AND COMPANY.

In the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United Act the Southern District of New York.

TOTAL MENTALLS CONTRACTOR TO THE STREET OF THE STREET OF THE

THE PART PRINCE SHIP - MEDICAL PROPERTY AND ASSESSED.

BEADLE AND ADAMS, PUHLISHERS.

SENTE MAISSINGE

MOTIOHOLD

SHEET-ANCHOR TOM.

Collinsia for a little confort behavior the own with the course the hardward from thought a success while the third contributed and

CHAPTER I.

OUTWARD BOUND.

Bound to Rio Janeiro for cotton, Brazil-wood and precious stones, the ship Meteor, passing through the Narrows, saluted the gray old Atlantic with every thing humming.

Sandy Hook had faded to a blue line, about four points abaft the weather-beam, and the vessel was tumbling among the heavy swells, when a sudden squall came pouncing upon her from the north-west. She took it like a spoiled coquette, showing her pretty heels and screaming as she ran. Away went the jib in tatters, and her fore and main-topmast studding-sails, flapping thunder, were carried, swift as a shot, straight up into the whirling rack of the storm. The active crew, having clewed up and down, were scattered among cracking spars and rolling canvas, to shorten sail, when the skipper of the ship—"Captain Tom," as he was familiarly termed—came on deck. His trumpet voice made every man pause.

"That's he; it will soon pass over!"

Even as he spoke the storm, with one farewell howl, swept to leeward like a black giant, carrying off its prey—the studding-sails torn from the Meteor.

Having ordered new ones rigged, Captain Tom walked his quarter-deck with the ease of a man accustomed to the rolling of a ship. He was a tall, well-made fellow, active as a panther, with curling black hair, clear, dark eyes, ready to look every man full in the face, and a pleasant, manly, sun-browned countenance. Although but twenty-five years old, yet he was quite well known among seafaring men. He was reputed to be rather wild and unmanageable, but strictly honest, and a good fellow in the main. A few years previously he had distinguished himself by saving the lives of more than a dozen passengers aboard a steamer, burnt off the coast of California, for which gallant behavior the owner of the Meteor had promoted him from a second mate to the command of his fine ship.

"Ay, ay," Tom muttered to himself, glancing round at his new, clean decks, his tapering spars, snow-white canvas and shapely hull; "I'm a lucky chap—that's plain. Here we go, bowling along for the Brazils, with a fair wind—the Metcor Captain Tom. It sounds queer—that does; but then, it's that truth. I am skipper of this craft, and I'll do my duty by her and all aboard."

At that moment Tom heard some person, with a low, musical voice, asking him if the storm was quite over.

Turning, he beheld Isabel Morton, daughter of the Meteor's owner, a beautiful young girl of eighteen, just come up from the cabin.

She was of lithe, graceful figure, hollow in the back, and well rounded, with a smooth, oval face, and pearl-white skin. Her eyes, when calm, looked blue, but when most expressive seemed nearly black, and shot the full power of feminine magnetism straight before her. She was of queenly bearing, but not at all haughty, either in manner or appearance. Her step, while dignified and elastic, was so light that a grasshopper would not have been injured by the pressure of her small feet. She had a wealth of blue-black hair, which, when loosened, hung below her waist in heavy, shining, undulating masses. As to the tones of her voice and laugh, they were as musical as the rippling, silvery notes of a piano, when a light hand is swept over the keys, enchanting all who listened.

Captain Tom, accustomed to the roar of winds and waves, was naturally very sensitive to a girlish voice. He turned, colored and lifted his cap, rather awkwardly, as he answered her question. There he stood, motionless as a statue, looking shyly at her with mingled respect and admiration, and with that curious feeling of humility with which an intelligent beautiful woman inspires a man not accustomed to femal society. Tom, bred to the sea almost from childhood, never had exchanged ten words with a woman of refinement. An orphan upon the ocean at eleven years, he had associated principally with the wild, island girls of the Pacific, the dark-eyed damsels of Chili, and those tawny specimens of the softer sex, the short, squat, square-headed female whale eaters of the Esquimaux coast.

Nevertheless, no man knew better than he how to appreciate noble women; for he had read of them, not only in English, but also in French and Latin, of which, by hard study, be had acquired an excellent knowledge.

Isabel did not seem to notice the captain's embarrassment. With a sweet smile she glanced from him to windward, where the morning sunlight was weaving thousands of diminutive rainbows amid the flying spray.

"Beautiful!" she exclaimed. "I really begin to cryy you sailor-men."

"I never before saw such a sight," said the gallant captain, staring straight at the countenance of his lovely companion.

She glanced at him, but he was afraid to meet her eyes. He turned his own toward the beautiful mist-spray to windward, and she thought he had alluded to that. I doubt that, even had she understood him aright, she would have cared much for the compliment. The girl's invalid father was aboard the vessel, a sea-voyage having been recommended to him by his physicians. His daughter had accompanied him for two reasons-to be near her parcut, whom she tenderly loved, and to get rid-for awhile, at least-of her many suitors, who, attracted as much by her father's weath as by her beauty, had wearied her with their attentions. She had hoped that at sea she would have a brief resting-spell; but she was disappointed. Her parent took with him his head clerk, William Clyde, a young, handsome man, of easy address, who had long, while keeping at a respectful distance, shown the beautiful girl that he admired her. At first she had pitied this suitor, who assumed that air of modest diffidence which he knew well would take with a woman of Isabel's stamp. Soon, however, the clear-sighted girl read through his affectation, and despised him for that as well as for his selfishness, his cunning, and his disposition to slander his rivals.

Gliding to her side just as she was about making a second remark to the captain, the young clerk drew her into contract sation.

Thereupon Captain Tom turned and moved away, sighing heavily.

"No chance for me," he thought, "against such a 'swell' as that."

He walked into the waist, and stood watching his men getting up the maintop-mast studding-sail. Soon a rain-cloud passed over the ship, and the drops began to fall.

Of course the sailors did not mind the rain; they worked on, singing as they toiled.

"That's the right spirit, men," said Captain Tom. "Work away, and when you are through, we'll just 'splice' a little, do you see; not enough to get drunk, though. I'll have none of that in my craft."

"Ay, ay, sir; hooray !"

"A couple of tauts, that's all," continued the young skipper.

" Hooray! hoo-ray!"

"And still another, after, just to wash down the t'other two.
As to those that don't want the extra taut, why they can just let it alone, that's all."

"Hooray! hooray! hoo-ray!"

The captain took off his cap and bowed.

"Beggin' your pardon, sir," remarked an old square-shoul-dered tar named Bill Turk—"there's something in the foke-stel (forecastle) that won't come up—a queer creatur' that I can't make out."

"I don't understand you, my man; what is it?"

"Well," answered Turk, "it ain't a ship-shape man, and it ain't a spook, and it ain't a grown-up-barnacle. Blast me, sir, if I know what it is," he added, hurling his quid overboard.

Tom's curiosity was aroused; he was about moving for ward, when he heard a hum of astonishment around him, ar saw all the seamen on deck glancing up toward the foretop gallant cross-trees. Some of them were grinning in a peculiar manner. Old Turk, half kneeling, with a hand upon each knee, and his shoulders hoisted above his ears, had his face all puckered up like a shriveled cabbage.

"That's the creatur' that wouldn't come up," said the old fellow. "Ay, ay, that's him, sure enough."

Tom followed the direction of all eyes, and saw seated on the cross-trees, one of his foremast hands—a very low sized man, wearing an enormous, glazed hat, and with a wooden box slung to his shoulder, while in one hand he held a blue umbrella, spread open above his head to keep off the rain.

An umbrella carried by a seaman aboard a ship! Surely such a case was never known before.

"My eyes," continued Turk, drawing a long breath, while the murmur of wonder grew louder and louder, "My ey-EY-EYES!"

Other equally expressive remarks were heard.

"Ahoy, there !" roared Captain Tom. "In the name of a thousand sea-devils, my man, what are you doing aloft there, with an umbrella, aboard my ship?"

Thus addressed, the person aloft turned a square, flat, sow face, with a red nose, toward the speaker.

"Excuse me, sir. I came aloft to see if I could discover so far north, any specimens of the exocoetus volitans, or flying fish."

"Never mind the flying-fish, but just fly down here, your self, as fast as you can. Don't you see there is work going on?"

The man descended to the deck.

"What is your name?" inquired Tom.

"Toby Slivers," was the reply. "Permit me, captain, to show you the curiosities in my box. I am a naturalist, but being too poor to take passage, I shipped here as foremast hand, for the purpose of pursuing my investigations in foreign lands and waters."

"Never mind your curiosities now, but just bear in mind that when there's work you must take a hand in it. I'll have no shirking in my craft."

"Indeed, I did not intend to shirk," said Toby, dolefully "Please tell me what I am to do."

He dropped his blue umbrella, rolled up his sleeves, and to show his zeal, threw the maintop-sail balliards off the pin, therety causing the yard to come down by the run A turn of the running rope caught him round his waist and drew him up a few feet, struggling and kicking.

"Enough," said the captain, as he helped the poor fellow down; "that will do. It is plain you've never been to sea before. I'll let you be my clerk, to keep a clean account of my writings and copy off my last year's log. You may at once go into the cabin and commence."

Accordingly, with his umbrella under his arm, Toby entered the cabin. He quickly had an interested audience—Isabel, Mr. Clyde and Mr. Morton, who came to see the butterflies, and other insects in his box. Soon, however, the naturalist remembered the writing he was to do, and went to work.

Later, the men were rigging the new maintop-mast studding-sail, and Captain Tom, who was fond of working aloft, went up to assist them, with marline-spike in one hand and rathine-stuff in the other.

A surer hand or foot than Captain Tom's was never known. He had been seen to climb the leach of a slatting sail in a gale of wind, and to walk atop of a boom when his craft was plunging bows under. Now, however, chancing to glance toward the quarter-deck, he caught the full glory of Isabel's blue eyes; and such was their power over him, that he lost his balance and tumbled headlong into the sea, marline-spike, ratline-stuff and all!

Isabel shricked; the cry of "Man overboard!" thrilled through the ship, and "Down with that wheel—haul back the main yard!" shouted the first mate.

A boat, headed by the second officer, and manned by a good crew, soon was in the water. They looked around them as the boat flew, and saw plenty of blue water, but no sign of the captain except his hat. Pulling for this hat they picked it up and found blood upon it.

"My God! I'm afraid he's lost!" cried the second mate.
"It's plain now that his head struck the rail when he fell.
I thought I heard the thug of the stroke when he tumbled."

With heavy hearts the men pulled hither and thither, until they suddenly heard a shout astern of them. There, a few fathoms distant, they saw the captain. They pulled for him and he clambered into the boat, disclosing a bruised and bleeding forehead.

"Are you hurt much, sir ?" inquired the second mate.

"Not much," was the reply. "I only grazed the rail. Have the lads got that studding-sail up yet?"

Ay, ay, sir," and a the state of the state of Soon after, the captain was aboard ship. Mr. Morton and his daughter both came anxiously forward, the girl's eyes full of pity.

"All riz';" said Tom, cheerily; "only a scratch!"

The steward appeared with a cloth, soaked in cold water, to lind around the bruised head. Isabel took it from him as I tied it round the wound with her own fair fingers. Sailor-men, she said, were not quite so expert in such matters at women. The touch of those fingers made Tom thrill all over. He would have been willing to fall again to have it repeated.

A mement later the steward proclaimed dinner, and they descended into the cabin. The three passengers dined at the same table with the captain.

"When we are through," said the latter to the steward, "carry a couple of bottles forward, and give each man three tan's apiece. If the rascals want more, just tell 'em they can't have it."

- " So you permit your men to drink?" remarked Mr. Clyde
- " Ay, ay, when they've been working hard."
- "I believe you were helping them work when you fell?"
- " I was."
- "It so his to me that, were I as used to going aloft as you are, captain, I should not have fallen."
- "Ay, ay, it rem clumsy of me," said Tom, taking the speech in good part. Then, encountering Isabel's soft eyes, he laughed and colored.
- "Big men, I believe, seldom have much command of their limbs," pursued the clerk.

Total made no reply. Perhaps the presence of Isabel operated as a check upon his temper.

"There's an old saying, Big frame, little spirit; but of course that's a slander," continued Mr. Clyde.

If re Mr. Morton endeavored to change the subject, and Is that in real severely upon the clerk. Believing, however, that in reality she was pleased with his audacity, Ciyde continued his bantering remarks. Tomedid not seem to herr him; in fact, the presence of Isabel threw a sort of mist bestween him and the others.

Stung by the contempt with which he was treated, Clyde continued.

"You must be more careful, in future, captain, when you go aloft. Your faling gave Miss Morton a severe shock. You have no right, you know, to trouble your passengers in that way."

"Why," exclaimed Tom, thrown off his guard, "it was those splendid eyes of hers that made me tumble !"

At this Isabel blushed like a sunset cloud, while Clyde drew down the corners of his mouth.

"Oh, shocking!" he ejuculated, in a most expressive manner. "Do you suppose that Miss Morton will believe that nonsense?"

"Why, now, blast you, what do you mean?" inquire! Tom, springing up.

"Gentlemen, no quarreling here!" said Mr. Morton, gravely;

" pray, sit down again."

"I mean what I say!" exclaimed Clyde, sneering under his black mustache. "I mean to assert that you tell an untrata—that your fall was not caused by Miss Morton's eyes."

A blow-a crash-a whizzing sound! Down went Mr.

Clyde, headlong into a corner.

"Captain, I am astonished at you!" exclaimed Mr. Morton, "Striking a clerk of mine—quarreling in the presence of my daughter?"

"I am a wretch," answered the captain, glancing at Is del's while, terrified face. "I should have controlled my unfatunate temper."

Meanwhile, Clyde, almost stunned and much bewillered by the captain's unexpected sally, had picked himself up and entered his room. Just then Toby Slivers, the naturalist, come forth, stating that the jar of Clyde's falling led caused him to make a great blot upon one of the pages of the log-book.

"Never mind," answered Tom, disconsolately, as he had ried on deck. "I have just made a worse blot than that."

He was thoughtfully walking his quarter-deck, when, feeling a hand on his arm, he turned to behold Clyde.

"You must give me satisfaction," he whispered.

"Well, heave ahead at once, like an honest man, and tell me just what you want?"

"Autilification! You must fight me with pistole"

'Any way or any where you please," answered Tom, indifferently.

"In Brazil we can find some solitary spot, where we may fight out our quarrel face to face !"

"Why, now, that's speaking like a man!" cried Tom, ex-

Clyde declined the proffered hand.

"Remember," he said, turning away, "one or the other of us shall never leave Brazil alive."

"Ay, ay," answered Tom. "Forward, there, one of you," he blithely added, addressing his men; "aloft there, and clear the resket at the foretop-gallant yard!"

All hands were busy except the steerage-boy—a lad who had rever before been to sea, and who seemed both to go aloft will the ship rolled and plunged among the seas. The mate, the ing his hesitation, picked up a rope's end to administer this hunch, when Tom interfered.

"None of that aboard my craft!" he sail, sternly. "The last is green, and will learn after awhile. Send up one of the men."

Isabel, who had just come on deck, and who, with wom his quick sympathy, would have interfered if Tom had not, felt the justice of his proceeding.

" He seems to be a man of good principle, this captain, in spire of his roughness," she said, mentally.

Then she fell into a fit of musing, now and then glancing toward the main-topsail yard, from which Tom had fallen, on account of her eyes.

"I have been complimented many times," she muttered, half-smilling, "but never before like that."

From that time she would often, unobserved by the Cq tein, watch him while he worked. He had not dured to address a word to her since his encounter with Clyde, believing that she was appry with him for having given way to his temper. He was the reference to be a when, one morning, she came up to his side and conversed with him about his ship. Clyde stood a few pages list put, watching the two with jedous eyes. He saw on the girl's face a look of interest which he did not helf like.

In due course of time the ressel drew near the coast of Brazil. To the south-west was seen the lofty summit of Square topsail Mountain, rising seven thousand feet above the sea, and further to the north, the conical Sugar-loaf, surrounded by blue hills. As the craft drew nearer, the many hitle islands in the bay, covered with the banana, the orange, the leader and the palm, became visible. Behind the folice of the gradie buildings, monuments, and ill-paved streets of the Junity were indistinctly seen, looming up from a light mist. The ering Botofogo Bay, the captain kept on, studing for a sneed late inlet between two sloping hills near the city. Findly the craft was anchored, and Tom at once lowered his quarter-boat to take Isabel and her father ashore. The ship owner intended, during the vessel's stay in port, to remain, with his doughter, in the mansion of an old Portuguese merchant—a friend with whom he often transacted business.

Soon the boat struck the beach, and Captain Tom had the pleasure of helping Isabel out. He stood watching her until she was no longer in sight, when he set out for a small through the town, leaving orders with his men to be in waiting for him at nine o'clock. At this hour he returned, to learn that one of those who had come ashore with him—Tody, the naturalist—had gone off and not yet come back. The men seemed to think that he had deserted, as he had harried off without telling them where he was going.

On hearing this, Captain Tom at once set out to hunt up the man, whom he could not afford to lose, being already that handed.

He hunted in many different quarters, but saw nothing of Toby, until he came in sight of the academy of restard lastory, in the southern part of the town, when he thought he behold the little man passing along one of the balour's. Having gained entrance to the building, he finally discovered the naturalist perched upon the back of a large, stall l, thak bear, which he was examining with great attention.

"Come," sail the captain, "it is time you were about !."

of this curious specimen of the Urous Americanes or American to the head of this curious specimen of the Urous Americanes or Ame

As he spoke, one of the keepers of the acalemy came up and asked him it he wished to make a deposit.

" A deposit?"

"Yes," was the reply; "to help us pay expenses."

So saying, the man drew forth a small key, and thrusting it into an aperture in the pearl-shell, opened the latter, disclesing the small contribution-box scooped in the bear's skull.

Mach mortified and disappointed, Toby Slivers jumped down and followed Tom, who, throwing a silver piece into the box, hurried out of the building.

They had not proceeded far when Tom felt some person touch him on the arm, and turning, beheld Clyde.

"Can you go with me now?" he inquired, significantly.

" Ay, ay," answered Tom, cheerily.

Billing Toby go on to the boat, he followed Clyde, who walked on until the two had reachel a retired spot in a valley.

Then the clerk drew a couple of pistols from his coatpocket, and presenting one to the captain, walked to the distance of about fifteen paces.

"Now, then, when I give the worl, we will fire!" he said, clenching his teeth.

"All right. I'm ready when you are," was the reply.

Clyde soon gave the word, and his bullet passed through fom's but. The captain's weapon did not go off.

Much surprised, he picked up a little stick, and thrusting it into the muzzle, discovered that the pistol was not loaded !

He sprung forward and caught Clyde by the throat. "Why, you contemptible rascal!" he exclaime !.

A theree light was in his eyes; but he controlled himself, and thrust the clerk away from him.

"Go—you are not worth striking," he said, contemptuously. White with excitement, Mr. Clyde slunk away and was noon out of sight. Tom reached the boat, soon after, and was pulled aboard.

CHAPTER II.

HOMEWARD BOUND.

In a few weeks, the Meteor's cargo being stowed, her captain was ready to sail. He had seen nothing of Clyde since the affair of the pistol; but, Mr. Morton had informed him that he had sent his clerk direct to New York on business, by a homeward-bound steamer, which left port a few days previously.

The ship's owner and his daughter were now abour! Isabel showed a woman's delight and interest, at sight of the small cases of precious stones which had been packed away in a chest in one of the cabin rooms, and which her father had given her permission to examine.

The beautiful chrysoberyl and topazes of yellow, white and blue, sparkled as if containing little moving rivulets of fire and water. There was among the collection a box of rare specimens of the Brazilian precious stone—a stone blue on one side, and perfectly clear and colorless on the other.

During the vessel's stay in port, Toby Slivers, the naturalist, had not failed to obtain a few curiosities of the insect tribe from the beautiful banks of the rivers. The little meneluce with its chining blue wings, together with the Nestor and Laertes, were added to the collection of butterflies in his box. He had seen a green parrot among the branches of some stupendous Brazilian trees, and had endeavored to capture it: but he was obliged to give it up after being bully senatelies!, and otherwise injured from climbing and trampling through swamps.

The afternoon was clear and cloudless when the Meters went out of port with the land-breeze.

By noon of the next day the land was out of sight. The silver flying-fish sported merrily round the bows, and the whistling porpoises were seen leaping and tumbling to whistly ward. Indeed came up and conversed so pleasantly was captain Tom, that, when she went below, soon after, he was if the sun had gone out of the heavens.

As day after day passed, the heart of the honest fellow was so full of the beautiful girl, that he thought of her every moment.

Tark, who now was promoted third mate, could not help realing the young man's feelings.

"Beggin' your pardon, captain," said he, one morning, "you some sort of subtracted (abstracted) of late. Something's on your mind."

"Ay, Turk," answered Tom, frankly; "there's no use of billing it. You can guess what it is."

" Easy enough, captain; but why not tell the girl you love her, and bring things to a p'int?"

"I can't muster courage. She's too good for me, you know."

- "She is a splendid creatur'; but then, do you see, cap, of posites sometimes comes together. Now there was a chum of mire named Croaker. He was as poor as an old piece of spun-yarn, but he married the darter of a rag-marchant, worth his thousands."
- "You should know," answered Tom, smiling, "that it's the fact of Isabel Morton being rich that prevents my telling her how much I like her."
- "I wouldn't be so particular," said Turk. "If I were in your place, I'd go to her and tell all. Leave it to me," he albel; "I'll make things right if you'll let me."

" You?"

"Ay, ay, sir; you just wait; you'll see."

Turk entered the cabin, and, having procured a piece of lett reper, drew thereon what he intended for a very moving picture of a heart with an arrow sticking in it. He put it in an envelope, sealed it, and slipped it under the door leading into Isabel's apartment. She was now on deck, but in less than half an hour after, she entered her room to set the note.

Opening it, she discovered the paper containing the picture, which surprised her very much, especially as she was unable to make it out.

At length she concluded it was the representation of some kind of a queer fish with a harpoon thrust through the center. Underneath were these words, scrawled in a large, irregular hand. "EMBLIM OF LUV. CAPTIN TOM'Z STAFT."

She smiled, and while much amused, wondered who was the author of the note.

She knew it could not be Captain Tom, having heard her father say that this person was a good scholar for a seam in. She went on deck, and soon divined who had sent her the drawing; for old Turk betrayed himself by his significant manner of watching her. She beckoned him to her side and showed him the paper.

"Did you draw this fish?" she inquired.

"Fish!" exclaimed Turk, coloring deeply; "beg pardon, Miss, but it isn't a fish—it's a heart as is involved in you; the heart of Captain Tom, pierced by an arrer. The lal's dead in love with you, ma'am."

Isabel blushed and frowned a little. Then, seeing the skipper approaching, she descended into the calin. She picked up a book, and, seating herself by her window, leg n reading without taking in the sense of the words. The frack, honest face of the young captain kept intruding itself up a her mind.

Early the next morning she was wakened from a sweet sleep by the hurried trampling of feet over her head. As soon as she had completed her toilet, she mounted to the quarter-deck to find her father already there, gazing anxiously off the weather-bow.

"What is it, papa?"

The old man pointed toward the north-east Lorizon.

"They say we are going to have a heavy blow."

Isabel looked, but could see nothing alarming, unless it were a thin, yellowish haze that floated where sky and water seemed to meet.

" Is that what you mean, papa?"

"That is not all: look higher up."

She did so, and now beheld a little, revolving cloud of a reddish brown, advancing along the sky. The cloud was surrounded by a luminous circle, something like that which is often noticed around the moon. Now and then a laid lightning dath would shoot from the revolving mass, followed by a crackling, grinding report, like that of a military " coffee mill."

"How curious," ejaculated the girl. "But, surely, there is nothing to fear from that insignificant cloud."

As she spoke, however, she noticed that the men were bettening down the hatches and striking top-gallant-masts and yards with the utmost dispatch. Extra lashings were being passed round the boats, while fore and aft parties were sy taking in sail aloft. Captain Tom, who had assisted in furling the jlb, now came aft trumpet in hand.

He lifted his cap to Isabel: then drew the old gentleman asile and said a few words to him.

"Come, we had better go below," remarked Mr. Morton, to his daughter.

"Captain," said the young girl, anxiously laying her arm on the skipper's shoulder, "disguise nothing from me. We are to experience great peril, are we not?"

"Ay, ay, Miss, we're going to have a rough time of it," answere! Tom; "but, I trust you need have no fear. Bear a lien!, there, lats!" he added, cheerily, addressing the men who were striking. "Lively is the word!"

"Ay, ay, sir!" came down from aloft, and just as the works were spoken, a rattling, crackling sound, like the din of artillery coming nearer and nearer, was heard in the far distance.

At the same moment Mr. Morton paused, and half turning, uttered a cry of wonder which was echoed by every man in the ship. It was caused by a sudden curious agitation of a large space of water, about a mile to windward. Here, the waves rushing together with a thundering noise like that of a great whirlpool, suddenly sent upward great sheets of spray and form that seemed to touch the very skies. This curious theretain, which was of a yellowish purple color, was, it soon became evident, caused by a mighty whirlwind, bearing down toward the ship with flightful velocity.

" My God, we are lost!" cried Mr. Morton.

" Keep off, there, at the wheel!" shouted Tom, cheerily, his voice ringing like the clang of a cymbal.

Still the whirlwind fountain bore toward the craft, advancing like some stupendous phantom giant, with mouth and aostrils roaring thunder.

Label shricked with terror.

"God help us " she cried, with trembling voice.

or That's he! Steady as you are!" shouted the young skip per, swinging himself into the mizzen-shrouds, as he addressed the man at the wheel. "A pull on the fore and main braces!"

Slowly the ship fell off, and with a buzzing, whizzing, booming noise, the huge moving fountain swept upon its way, just grazing the rail as it passed. Its course was as swift at that of the shalow of a flying cloud, and it grew smaller and smaller in the distance as it swept on until it seemed to larger than the mast of a schooner.

Meanwhile the little cloud was rolling rapidly upon its way, growing larger every moment. The erackling grin in grains deepened, and the lightning-flashes became incessort. The air seemed full of electricity; sparks, rings, and little citains of fire filled the thickening atmosphere. At the same moment the whitening of the agitated water to win lward proclimed the nearness of the tempest. A din equal to the rour of a thousand cataracts was heard; the timbers of the stort samp began to hum and quiver as if already feeling the shock. The air grew darker and darker, until the red sam was valled by a vapor like black smoke.

Mr. Morton drew Isabel into the cabin not a moment too goon.

"Up helm—mind yourself at that wheel!" came Tom's cheering voice; and then, with wind, lightning, thunder, and sheets of driving spray and rain, the storm dash I its f against the ship.

Lower and lower—for over on her beam-ends she way, humming and quivering from stem to stern, with her three topmasts bending and cracking like willows, and her solitare pieces of canvas—the close-reefed maintop-sail and topic staysail flying to shreds.

A moment she remained almost stationary, then, illers to huge sea-monster, tossing her bows far on high, she shows from her the cataracts of rushing water, and show stading all whale. Meanwhile the ahead with the speed of a wounded whale. Meanwhile the seas pursuing, came bubbling, boiling, roariest and gargling over bow and quarter, almost burying her at times, and compelling all hands to struggle hard to keep from being washed away. The shrouds, with the wind whistling and screaming in them, snapped at every plunge, and the long vards creaked dolerally in the slings. All around the vessel, the electric fires were continually visible, running along the yards, down the masts, and along the rails like little flery serpents, while browier and more vivil flashes lighted the roaring, gargling or an. The roise of the thunder was almost unintermittent, charging, rolling and crashing, like some large brazen wheel is over an iron floor. At each thish the seamen bevel they could see a huge flery balt, about ten times as ing as the sun, a mile to windward suspended midway I ween sky and sea. This appearance is quite common during the territic than ler-storms which sometimes occur off In Brezilian coast; but it would be impossible to give a true e ne ption of the strange, gleastly, larid light which the mon-- ; res fire-gl be throws at such times over the phospher lighted waters, as they roll bouncing along toward the black herizon. The face of the gale kept increasing, so that at times the maily-planging ship seemed lifted up to the very clouds on the shricking wind.

Mr. Morton and his daughter, down in the cabin, were be-william I by the motion of the ship.

Isabel, feeling the vessel sullenly roll over so that her lee yer i-arms were immersel, crept, faint and trembling with fright, up the companion way, and peered through a small opening in the slide over the entrance.

At the same moment she heard a terrible cry :

" Land, 'O! two points off the lee-bow?"

" What's that? Land?" gasped Mr. Morton.

" Yes, papa."

"I'm airail it's all up with the Meteor," Isabel heard Turk y, as he passed the cabin.

The gill chespel her bands, and uttered a low cry.

" Let us pray !" sail Toby Slivers, who had crept to her sile.

" Harb-a-pert!" shouted Captain Tom, without.

"Als, my God, we are lost!" mountal Isabel, as she caught a registroit the lower, from they walls of rock ahead, seem-

" Lase the forestil !" cried Captain Tom.

"It is no use," sighed Toby Slivers. "We had better say

"Steady—as -you—go!" roared the young skipper, cheer ily, through his trumpet.

Mr. Morton now made his way to the deck.

- "My ship—my cargo—our lives—all are drowned!" to sail, despairingly, as the foresail, which the men could only half-loosen, flew into shreds.
- "Clear away that sheet anchor!" thun level Captain Ton-

"The Lord have mercy upon us!" gasped Toby Slivers creeping out on deck and falling on his knees.

"A pull on the lee main-brace!" roared the young cap-

Encouraged by his voice, the men obeyed every order as promptly as the seas sweeping the decks would permit them to do. As previously mentioned, the land was off the labor. A light mist, which slightly vailed without hiding it, rendered its appearance all the more terrible on that accord. Rock above rock, pile upon pile, rose in runged pyramids, while beneath the thunder-water of the storm, mally straking against the base, sent great sheets of spray flying up half-way to the summit of the elevation. The seamen, watching the rocks, saw several huge birds, in attempting to fly rord an angle of the cliff, blown against it with such force that they were unable to discurage themselves. Their mall shriks were heard, thrilling through the storm din, so like the despairing cries of a drowning crew, that many of the men shrunged their shoulders superstitiously as they listened.

Meanwhile, the ship was now dashing along upon a correspondent, unless the maintop-sail helpel her, and she obeys have below better than at present, must carry her straight to her doom against the rocky wall.

Captain Tom, providing himself with a telescope, scruticized the shore closely, and soon concluded that there was a bay beyond the south east angle of the cliff, partially shelfered from the storm. He could form no decided conclusion as to what part of the Brazil coast he was approaching; but he did not think that he was more than four hundred names to the southward of Rio Janeiro.

His every effort now must be directed to getting the craft into the bay beyond the cliff, and to accomplish this, more canvas was required. Therefore, he ordered the men to shake a reef out of the maintop-sail and loosen the mainsail—maneuvers deficult of accomplishment, in such a gale. They were accomplished, however, and the mainsail being made of extra good cloth, held stoutly.

Captain Tom himself now assisted the man at the wheel, and with great exertion the ship was brought up about half a point, so that she ran in a direction nearly at right angles with the cliff. Whether or not she would succeed in passing the edge of it, beyon! which was the bay, remained to be seen. O!! Turk shook his head doubtfully, and the second mate looked very black, but Tom's face was full of hope.

"We will pass it," he said, "if the mainsail stands, when we can run into the bay and drop our anchors, which, if they hold, will make us all right."

"I think it's doubtful if they'll hold," said Turk. "There's to very good holding-grown I in these parts."

"Captain," said Mr. Morton, sally, "I suppose we must prepare for our fate."

"Well, the truth is," said Tom, "you may be right. Still, there's hope yet. All ready, men!" he added. "Stand by the cable!"

The rocks were now frightfully near. Turk set his teeth hard, the first and second mates fairly trembled with suspense. Captain Tom was the only man whose facedid not change as the vessel flew on toward the edge of the cliff. This was row less than a mile ahead, so that the crew were enabled to perceive that a strong current ran around it with great swiftness.

- "That current will settle us!" sail the second mate.
- " It will help us!" replied Tom.
- "We shall soon see," cried Turk.

Booming on, the vessel soon was within twenty fathoms of the rocky point.

At the same moment, with a report like thunder, the mainsheet give way and the sail flew to tatters. Caught in one of the eddying currents, the vessel was drawn with frightful against toward the dangerous point.

"No help for us, now?" howled Turk, hurling his quid into

"God have mercy upon us!" cried Mr. Morton, throwing an arm around Isabel's waist.

" Papa, dear papa, must we die?" exclaimed the young girl, en-leavoring to nerve herself for the trial.

The men stood motionless, their lips compressed, their brown faces blanched. Toby Slivers fell upon his knees.

" Let us all ask help of God; let us all pray," he murmured, "that we may die like true Christians!"

"Hard down with that wheel!" roared the young cap-

So saying, he sprung to the helm, and, lending his Herculean strength to those who steered, contrived to put the wheel hard-a-port.

Still there was no perceptible change in the vessel's course. Less than twenty fathoms from the rocky point, she was still being drawn toward it, with unabated swiftness. The spray, flying up from the base of the cliff, was already sweeping into the shrouds, while an ominous grating noise was heard along her keel.

Tom, still hopeful, kept his eye upon the ship's heal. He knew that she must answer her helm sooner or later, in spite of wind or current, but the question was, would she do so in time to avoid the tearible catastrophic which most of the crew seemed to think inevitable?

The grating sounds along the keel grew leader every moment; still nearer to the rocks flew the strutzling craft; a wall cry—a howl of despair—burst from the lips of many of the men, who, clinging to ropes and belaying-pins, were expecting to hear the fearful crash, when, swift as a thunderbook, the ship's head suddenly swung up! This just saved her from striking the point, round which she was now carried with the rapidity of a whirlwind, into the broad bay beyond! This bay was only partially sheltered from the storm. The great seas came rolling into it, crashing with the din of thunderbooks and careering far over the juzged rocks along shore. The current here was very strong, and drew the ship with inconceivable rapidity toward a danger as racf partial with the const.

The salvation of the craft, therefore, deponded upon her being held. Captain Tom at once gave orders to let go the top-sail halliards off the pin.

PAST. 20

One red by his confident voice and manner, the men promptly of eye I orders, and the rattling of the cable was heard as it began to run through the Lawse-hole. Just then an apporting crash was heard, and down came the foretop-mast, falling forward over the lows, with much of the rigging attached to it. Part of this rigging getting foel of the anchor-flukes, at a the other part becoming entangled with the sprit-sail yard. The pond rous mass of iron was saddenly checked in its descent.

Me anwhile there was the reef, less than a quarter of a mile distant, it's black, weed-covered rocks rising gloomily through the white, flying spray.

There was no time to lose, and Captain Tom's voice rung sharply through the din.

"Lively, men, clear that anchor! Bear a hand—bear a hand, my lads!"

The samen, however, shrugged their shoulders; not one could muster sufficient courage to venture over the bows in the milst of the boiling, bubbling cauldron of waters, pouring over them.

"I'll go," said Turk, proceeding to fasten a rope around his waist.

Captain Tom pushed him aside.

"I have heard you had a wife and children living," said he:
"there is re I, who am a single man, without one living relative, had better go."

He had already sprung upon the bows, with a rope fastened aro in I his breast, and he now swung himself upon the anchor, ax in hand, to clear away the rizging. One of the men, seizing a nandspike, thrust the end into the hawse-hole, so as to keep the cable from running until the captain, after having mole all clear, should return to the deck. His situation certainly was one of great peril. The seas were almost continually pouring over him, and so great was the strain upon the rope holding him, and the force with which it rubbed against the copper sheathing on the rail, that it soon flew as under. It was only with the greatest difficulty that he could now keep himself from being washed away, by holding on to the rigging, which he was endeavoring to clear.

Meanwhile, with his disengaged hand, he plied his av with such vigor that the mass of rigging had soon almost drated away from the anchor. At this moment, however, the ship made several mad plunges, burying bows, windless and from the soon that Tom, for a while, was completely sire and from view, among the gargling, bolling mass of waters.

When next seen, his situation was discovered to be by appalling. The rigging, no longer holding the audicine, and wound itself round and round his body, fastening him to the mass of iron as firmly as if he were in a vice.

He writhed and twisted himself in every direction, but all in vain; he fell back, exhausted with his struggles. The men endeavored to assist him, but his position was now such, and the seas sweeping over him were so violent, that no person could reach him.

Meanwhile, the ship was every moment drawing nearer to the dreaded reef, now less than forty fathoms distant. The captain, turning his head, saw the bleak rocks frowning through the white spray. He saw them distinctly, did to the his brain was dizzy from the nearly vertical position in which he lay, and the mad plunges of the ship.

Tossed up and down, blown like a mere chip, the growing, struggling craft would occasionally seem to lift him far up into the black, flying rack of the storm, and then carry han away down into the hollows between the waves, making the blood rush to his head, and crusing every nerve to thrill with a strange, sickly sensation. He was weak and faint; therefore he hurriedly issued what he believed would prove to be his last or ler to his men. The latter saw his lips move, and heard his voice, but, on account of the storm-din, were at first unable to understand what he said. Finally, as the ship was lifted high on the crest of a counter-sen, the sail as charging to the bows heard their captain, who repeated his words.

"Let the anchor go, lals, and save the ship. Never mind

The men could not bring themselves to obey such a aummand. Were they to let the archor go, Tom, attached to it, must, of course, be carried with it to the bottom.

"Do you hear there?" repeated the young skipper. "Let the cable run, and save the ship, Isabel, and-"

The rest was drowned in the booming of the ocean, as the vessel planged far down into the roaring abyss of waters. To Mr. Morton the last words of the young man were repeated by one of the officers, who came from forward, to see to the helm. Isabel, who stood clasped by her father's arms, no sooner heard them than her pale face became flushed and her eyes shone with resolution.

"No!" she exclaimed, "that shall not be! The captain must not be sacrificed on our account. Oh, is there no way to save that brave man?"

As she spoke a tremendous sea, striking the ship, hurled her forward swiftly as an arrow toward the reef, now less than twenty fathoms distant. A grinding crash was heard along her bottom, proclaiming that she had struck and passed over a sinken rock. The shock threw every man off his feet, the sailor holding the crable from running with the handspike being among the number. Thus fixed, the iron links spun through the hawse hole, and the ponderous sheet-anchor masked into the sea! The ve sel struck nearly at the same moment, upon one of the reef-rocks, the force of the concussion, however, being much modified by the anchor, which had found go d holding-ground.

The timbers were heard, cracking open in many places as the craft went over upon her beam-ends, while the great seas dashing against her swept her decks fore and aft. With a great dod of trouble, the first mate contrived to lower the cater, in the chocks to loower he All hands (including Mr. Morton and Isabel) with the exception of three of the men, who had been washed overboard, and the unfortunite captain, opening the boat, left the dominal ship, just as she she red of a few fathoms to be ward and planged out of sight beneat the angry waters.

The tremen loas sees, sweeping over the reef, saved the criter's occupants. Caught by one of the hoge shore-bound wills of weder, the boat was litted upon its crest and swept lite a shot high up on the beach far beyond. The light vessel was lashed to pieces, but these in it were save fat the expense of a few-bruised limbs.

The party enfered a large hollow in a rock, beyond the reach of the seas, where Isabel, who was faint and nearly senseless, was partially restored to strength by a few drops of brandy from a flask in Turk's pocket.

"The captain," she marmured, sadly—"the noble captain Oh, what has become of him?"

Old Turk turned his head aside.

"The brave hal died doing his duty nobly," he sail, in a hoarse voice. "If he had allowed me to go, it would have been better, as I'm an old hulk not worth preserving."

Isabel uttered a sudden cry, and pointed toward the water just beyond the reef.

"A human hand!" she exclaimed. "See! it is lifted up, it beckons to us!"

All eyes were turned in the indicated direction, where, sure enough, the hand was plainly visible. The spray, dashing to one side, soon disclosed a face.

"The captain! it is the capain!" was echoed on all sides.

"Ay, ay," howled Turk, "it must be him! he's got clear of the anchor; but how is it he don't move? He's a good swimmer, besides which the seas a-coming in ought to bring him to us?"

"There's some mystery about this matter," said Mr. Morton. "Perhaps he has become wedged, has got fast in a rock under water, from which he can not extricate himself."

Tark threw off his jacket and shoes; then festened the end of a coil of rope, which had been brought ashere in the boat, around his waist.

"I'll go and see what's the matter with the lal, shipmates.
You must stand by to haul!"

So saying he plunged into the sea, and taking advantage of the suction force of a receding wall of water, he body strock out for the reef. As this was but fifteen fathers from the beach, he reached it before another sea came rolling in, and chinging to it, waited for another chance. Soon this was afforded him, and with great exertion he finally reached the spot where the hand had been seen. Here, sure enough, he found Captain Tom, thoroughly exhausted and about to go under.

"Quick, my brave fellow," he gasped. "Make a dive and cut away the piece of rigging that holds one of my legs."

"A piece of riggin,' lad?"

"Ay, ay. When the anchor carried me under, the rigging that held me drifted loose, so that I managed to rise to the surface before I was quite sufficated. On striking out for the shore, however, I perceived that one of my legs was still held by some part of the rigging attached to the anchor. I have ever since been trying in vain to extricate myself from it."

An ther hoge sea now was rapidly approaching—there was not a moment to lose.

Accordingly pulling his sheath-knife from his belt, Turk dove, and soon finding the troublesome rope, severed it with one blow of his knife.

"All right!" he said, as he rose to the surface.

He had just time to chasp the captain in his arms, when the expected sea came thundering upon them, and whirled both men against the reef. Bruised and nearly senseless, they must have perished but for the timely exertions of their shipmates on shore.

Those who held the rope attached to Turk's waist, hauled the old seaman in, while the rest, plunging into the sea, caught a firm hold of the captain and contrived to pull him high up on the beach.

With the help of a little brandy, both men soon revived, when all hands crowded round the captain, cheering him.

"Thank you," said Tom, bowing. "But I'm sorry you didn't let go the sheet-anchor when I told you. You might then have saved the ship."

"Yes, at the expense of your life," said Mr. Morton. "We were not willing to do that."

Turk now jumped upon a rock.

"Shipmates," said be, "that sheet-anchor adventure of our yourgen, world to be remembered. Such, do you see, being the case, and cateful ring the way the anchor hung to hun, I proposed that we give him a name as is characterisis, the name of Shippraxenor Tom?"

This proposal was greated with cheers, and from that time the captain was always spoken of among scafaring men by the new name for which he had been so dangerously baptized.

CHAPTER III.

SAIL, 'O ! AND ANOTHER WRECK.

THE castaways remained in the cave until the st.rm. had a bisided, on the following morning. They then erected temporary shelters, with shrubbery and moss, after which they went to work, dragging ashore such bales and boxes as were found floating clear of the wrecked craft. In this way, a quantity of biscuits and meat were obtained, together with several chests of clothing. No sign of the ship itself was visible, although Captain Tom, with his friend Turk, leaving prepared a rude raft, paddled out to the spot where the vessel had gone down. Both men were of the opinion that she had some into one of those underwater gulleys, of almost unfathomable extent, which are sometimes found in the vicinity of rects.

Mr. Morton bore his loss bravely; but it was evident that the hardships he had recently undergone had impaired his strength very much. Isabel watched him anxiously, and more than once she grew pale with anxiety as she noticed his drouping frame and hollow, feverish cheek.

Captain Tom did every thing in his power to make heren! her parent comfortable, and felt more than a thousand times repaid for his trouble by the glances of gratitude that beam? I upon him from her soft eyes.

"If I could only make her mine," the poor fellow weight say mentally; "but I'm attaid that can never be. I'd never dare to tell her I loved her."

Her presence, and the satisfaction of waiting upon her, made him very happy. There was another very happy man among the party. This was Toty Slivers, the naturalist, who, through all his recent parils, had contrived to save his valuable box and the underthal. Grubbing timong hollows in the earth, tangled thickets and crevices in the rocks. Toty tursued his interesting investigations with pleasant need in

He discovered some very curious insects, among which was a large, black spider, with a red spot upon its back and long, prickly legs. While showing this creature to his friends, the insect suddenly jumped out of the little box in which he had imprisoned it, and made straight for its captor. Knowing that it was poisonous, Toby fled ingloriously, during which, the insect made its escape in triumph.

On the third day after the wreck, long, rolling seas came than lering upon the beach. Toby was preparing for a namble when saddenly he behold a sight which at once excited his interest. A little fish, about the size of a cuttle, and almost as round as a ball, with a short, stubbed tail, and apparently but one eye, was washed high and dry upon the sand. Toby watched it a moment, transfixed with joyful astonishment.

"God is good," said he, "to bring this prize directly within my grasp."

He bounded toward it with a glad shout, and seizel it, when it wriggled away from his clasp, and, in its frantic evo-Intions, went whirling off, apparently upon the tip of its tail, its one eye fixed upon its pursuer in a peculiarly sly manner. Toby made another spring for it—again it chaled him, still wriggling off toward the water. He could not hold it when be grasted it, owing to its being so slippery; so, dencing of triampleantly upon its tail, the little creature finally reached its native element. Determined to capture it, dead or above, Toby spring upon the rad, provided with look, line and buit, which, with other useful articles, he always carried about him, and pulled after it—the fish remaining visit te under the c'er, the water. Sallenly it disappeared, and the naturalist new to ! his hook and line. He fished for his proy for several in its latitue givens it up. By this time, the rate had drived ' - Allen'le ber nitheref, and behal stout on his return, when, are all the regard point of the G. I, he belief a sal, about two least distant. He signaled it at once, by tymera I are a the end of one of the pold early with the then have not shoreward to acquaint the pary with the red news.

Is del was overjoyed when informed of the discovery, and Captain Tom, at once mounting a high precipice, affording him a good view of the stranger, soon perceived that she was appreaching.

Before nightfall, the whole party were aboard the vessel, which proved to be the Trumpet from Valparaiso, bound to New York. The castaways were kindly treated during the passage, which proved a short one, as the vessel was for a firt-night favored with fair winds. As the craft neared New York, Sheet-anchor Tom grew sad.

He would part from Isabel in the city, and perhaps now to see her again. He thought much upon this matter, and the division concluded that he would tell her he loved her.

He therefore descended into the cabin, where she sat realing. She looked very lovely—enchanting, he thought—and his heart beat rapidly as he waited for her to look up, for he did not wish to interrupt her. Finally, she raised her eyes—those large, soft, expressive eyes, and looked at him kin by and calmly. Now, his heart beat still harder, and to save his life, he could not, just then, have uttered a word.

There he stood, coloring deeply, feeling abashed, almost overwhelmed at the very thought of what he had been about to do.

He bowed to her in a confused manner; then walked to a corner of the state-room, and taking down his quadrant, which, in reality, he had no use for now, as he was not about his own ship, he went on deck.

A few days later, the vessel reached New York, and Tom soon found himself ashore, with Mr. Morton and Isabel. The former cordially invited him to call and see them, whenever he was so inclined, and the young captain's heart thrilled when he noticed that the girl seconded the invitation with her beattiful eyes.

A week after, he presented himself at the ship-own r's residence. I-abel greeted him kin lly, but he saw a shale of sorrow in her eyes.

"Papa is very sick," she sail. "Some speculations into which he entered largely, before sailing, have proved tallness, and he has lost a great deal. He has worried himself into a brain fever."

"Ay, ay, now, but that's too bad," said Sheet-anchor Tom.
"Can I do any thing to help him? I have a few thousands laid up in the bank, do you see, and, if it'll be of any nee, why, just say the word, and he shall have it."

Isabel declined the offer with many thanks. Her father, she sail, could not be persuaded to borrow a cent, as he was already largely in debt.

Not long after, Tom took his leave. The next day he met a ship-owner with whom he was quite well acquainted, who intermed him that Mr. Morton had die I that morning.

"His place, furniture, every thing, in fact, must go to pay his debts. He has lost a fortune within the past two weeks --has left his daughter nearly penniless."

This news filled Tom with dismay; his heart was very heavy on Isdel's account, and his eyes glared like a lion's, as he thought of the hungry creditors swarming round the young girl.

"One thing is certain, however," he reflected; "her many sait as will be on hand to help her in this hour of her need. Perk as some one of them may now persuade her to marry him." And Tom breathed a deep sigh.

On the following morning he made his way toward the residence of the deceased ship-owner. As he approached, he saw several rough-looking men lugging the rich mahogany farniture down the steps, and piling it upon large wagons drawn up in front of the house.

He accessed one of them, asking him if Miss Morton intended to move.

The man laughed coarsely.

"I don't know any thing about that," said he. "My employers is Brown & Co., a actioneers. As Mr. Morton owed a large sain, you know if payment can't be had one way it must be had the other."

An cher man now appeared on the top of the steps in front of the Leve, with a beautiful bird-cage, containing a little Carry set. Sor. The bird looked much frightened, especially when its careless holder dropped the cage, causing it to roll down the steps.

"()h, men, for heaven's sake, don't hurt my poor bird!" cried a pleating voice, and glancing up, Tom saw Isabel looking out of a window.

"Is it yours, Miss?" inquired the man, with a course lear how long since?"

"Why, blast you, of course it's hers!" roared Sheet-anchor the cage from his hand.

"No-no; do not get yourself into a quarrel on my account, captain," cried Isabel. "Let the cage go. I believe they have a right to it, according to law."

"Ay, ay, but what kind of law?" cried Tom. "It isn't plain sailing, at all, do you see?" he added, dealing the man a tremendous blow between the eyes, as he rushed upon him to regain the cage.

Down came Isabel, white with alarm, throwing herself be tween the two men.

"For heaven's sake!" she gasped, "no quarreling here Captain—captain—I beg of you to let this man have the cage."

A couple of policemen now arrived upon the scene, and Tom was soon informed that, by law, the man had a right to the property.

The young sailor then drew forth his pocket-book, saying that he would buy the cage. The carman had no objection, provided his employers were willing, but he must ask their consent.

Mounting his cart, which was loaded, he then drove away, while Tom, by Isabel's invitation, entered the house. He was surprised to find no person within, except the men who were moving the farniture, and one distant female relative of the bereaved girl. Suitors, friends and all had deserted her on account of her poverty.

"Ay, ay, now, but this is too bad!" said Tom. "Esy, there, easy with that funiture," he added, addressing the two carmen, who were handling chairs and tables in such a manner as to distarb Isabel, who looked much fatigued.

He endeavored to soothe the girl with gentle words, but he was, as usual, so embarrassed by her presence that he was unable to say much.

He remained until the cumen—having nearly stripped the house from top to bottom—were gone, when he took his leave to return in the course of a few hours with the bird-eage, which he had purchased of the auctioneers, at a large discount. He put the article upon a chair by the young girl's side, and without waiting for a word of thanks, departed.

Mr. Morton's funeral took place the next day. The hearse was followed by only two carriages—one containing Isabel and her relative, the other occupied by Sheet-anchor Tom, his talk he ate, Bill Tark, and the naturalist, Toby Slivers, who lodged at one and the same hotel.

A work at or the tangral, Isabel summined her father's credic is. Then, with puls check and glittering eyes, she confirm to them, her lishe, queenly form drawn up to its ral hight.

"Gentleman," she said, "this house has been bequathed to me. With the exception of fifty dollars it is all the property I have in the world. I intend sching the house, as soon as possible, when I shall be able to partially satisfy your claims. You must give me time to pay the rest."

There was a low murmur. The greater part of the audience expressed their satisfaction—their confidence that Miss Morten would eventually pay them up; after which all departed.

When, a week later, Isabel had fulfilled her promise, Captella Tem visited her, begging her to accept a loan of a few hundreds from him. She refused, with many thanks.

"I have still enough to pay my passage to Liverpool," sho said. "I have a friend there who will, I doubt not, be glad to ergage me to teach her children mude and French. In fact, I promised some time ago, to pay her a visit."

"I'll be the captain of the craft that takes you to Liver-pool," said Tom, joyfully.

Isabel looked up at him with glad surprise.

"What? Are you going in that direction?" she inquired. "What's the name of your ship?"

"I haven't got my ship yet," answered he, coloring with

It was for the sake of being near her that he intended

That way day, after taking leave of the girl, he applied to Mr. Marlow, a ship-owner, of a Liverpool line, and informed him that he wanted a vessel.

Marlow looked at the speaker steadily a moment, then lowcred his eyes, and scraped the floor thoughtfully with one foot

- "Well, really, captain, I-well, the truth is, I dare not trust you?"
- "What?" cried Sheet anchor Tom, opening his cyes with with astonishment.
- "I have been informel," continued the ship-owner, "that it was through your—your—carelessness, to use no strenger term, that the Meteor was lost!"

"What do you mean, sir? Who told you that, and what do you had at? Come, sir, please speak out like a man!"

- "Well, then, I have had no particular informant; but the story has been going the rounds among all the ewaces, along our river-front, that you lost the Meteor either through cure-lessness or drunkenness!"
- "It is false!" cried Tom. "What a lubberly report! I'll like to find out the author of it. I'll be bound he wasn't aboard, at the time. Any of my crew will tell you a far different story."

The owner shook his head.

- "The crew of a captain, who is kind to them, will not always stick to truth about their commander."
- "Ay, ay, but then-why, blast it, man! you do not don't my word, do you?"
- by report. Were I, after what's been said about yes, to put you in communit of one of my vessels, it would but I me into had repute, at once, and would injure my his liness. All the other owners will tell you the same thing."

Mortified and surprised at the structe turn of all its. The nucle his way to several other offices, where he was record pretty much in the same manner as he had been on his first application.

As he harried along in no very pleasant frame of his like electrical to glance up, when he belief his him with quitter of the piers and apparently watching him with quitter of the piers and apparently watching him with quitter of the harries. Tom was not at all of a suspicious hat ro, it these laptons made that perhaps this man had spread the higher as repeats which had caused him so much trouble. Anxious to find each he approached Clyde, who, however, suduciny turning them his heel, disappeared among the passing crowds near the pier.

Finally, reaching his hotel, the captain informed Turk of the unexpected result of his applications for a vessel.

The old tar was astonished.

"Praps," said he, "that Toby Slivers, with his bugs and butterthes, is at the bottom of the matter. I always thought that thep would be givin' us trouble."

Toby was applied to, but he denied having said a worl to any person about the wreck, except in praise of the cuptain's behavior.

On the next day, Sheet-anchor Tom received a note from Isabel, in which she requested him to inform her whether or not he lead changed his intention of taking command of a Liverpool vessel. She went on to say that she would preter being in a vessel under his command than in any other, but that, if he had changed his mind, she should take passage in the Paying Cloud, which would sail in a week.

From was in despair. He answered the note with his usual frankness, telling every thing. Having dispatched it, he felt must a fit of musing, from which he was only roused by a hard slop upon his shoulder. Looking up, he saw Toby, intent upon securing a curious little moth, which had alighted upon the captain's shoulder.

"Beg pardon," said Slivers, "for intrading, but the insect was in my room first, from which he flew to yours."

"Toby," inquired the young skipper, looking up, "do you intend to ship?"

" I shall have to, I think, as my funds are getting low."

"Well, then, you will not have me for a captain, next time, so you expected, for I can not get a ship."

"I am sorry," answered Toby; "but I must go to sea at one. I think I shall ship in that wesel in which, as Torreini mass her, you said Mis Morton would take passes—the Indian Chail. Tak thinks of going in the same cray."

As in the outsomed to stake the copt in.

"I will do it," he muttered, when Toby was gave.
"I run take of being near her, I will ship in the I'm at Cloud as foremast hand?"

On the next day he informed Turk of his intention.

I would have allowed you to go in my place. Yesterday two men were wanted to make up the Flying Cloud's crew. Toby shipped since then—yesterday alternoon—and I shipped this morning."

"Well, now, fate seems against me, sure enough," says to regain his usual cheerfulness.

Six days later, the day before that appointed for the saint of the Flying Cloud, which was already being cast loose home the pier, Toby and Turk knocked at the door of Tom's ream, as they wished to bid him farewell.

There was no response—all was silent in the room. As the knock was repeated, a waiter passed.

"There is nobody there," said he. "The cartain left the hotel last night."

" Are you sure?"

"Yes; paid his bill and left."

Much surprised, the two men made their way to the ship, just in time to get abourd before she was cust loose.

The next morning she was towed down the bay, and soon after she passed through the Narrows, with a fair will.

Isabel stood upon the quarter-deck, saily watching the lessening shores, when she heard a light step at her side.

Looking up, she was much surprised to see her late parent's head clerk, Mr. Clyde. He took off his cap, lowing and smiling.

"This meeting is very unexpected!" exclaimed the your girl.

"Can you not imagine why I am here?" he inquire, a his gentlest tone.

" No, sir."

"I will inform you, then, that I have not desert I ye, like the ret of your sators. I could not supert the real of your trusting yourself to the wide or an without it also protector."

"You mistake, sir; I have a couple of friends of and," a she motioned her head toward old Tark and Tody Sav who were colling up some rigging.

Mr. Clyde laughed.

"They could not help you much in case of necessity," he

I'm much mistaken, is not over easy with his men."

He nelled as he spoke toward a short, square-shoullered men, with a very red face, eyes small and parrot-slequel, a first book its land fists like the knots on an oak tree.

The present Mr. Soubb, the skipper, was rearing out his or destine and built or agroup of men forward, dragging the cable with their chain-hooks.

"Yes," continued Clyde, "I am here to be near you in easy you need protection. You are not angry with me?"

"No," she quietly answered. "On the contrary I thank you very much for your kind interest in my behalf."

"Oh, Isabel!" said he, lowering his tone, "I have never before dared to tell you that I love you; but now—now that you have lost so much—now that you are cast addiff upon a cold, heartless world—my feelings will no longer permit me to remain silent. I love you—love you as man seldom has have l—and ask you to give me the right of protecting you forever—the right of a husband."

Isobel was surprised — more than that, she was deeply touched.

Clyde's eyes, his manner, his voice—all proclaimed that he was in carnest. In fact, what better proof that he loved is represent alone than his proposing to her, now that she was stapped of every cent of the wealth which had attracted so many of her suitors.

Printed for her reply.

In a was not long delayed. She quietly withdrew her here I a lis, and look I am calady in the face.

"I would not spoken that," she replied, "fr I am griceed to say that I can never be your wife. I shall, however, always think of you as one of my truest friends."

"You mean to say you do not love me," he sail, in a

" Not as a wife should love a husband," she answered.

He turned very pale, clenched his teeth, and paced the deck several times. Then he returned to her side.

" For God's sake, Isabel, give me a better answer. Perhaps, after all, you may be mistaken."

She would now have pitied him, but for a certain force, angry light in his eyes, which at once roused the combatily ness of her nature.

"No," she replied, quietly but decidedly, "I meant what ' said."

" Coquette !"

"What do you mean, sir?"

"You have led me on with false hopes!"

Her eyes flashed.

"You know better than that," she said. "You know that I have never given you any encouragement."

He changed his tacties. It would not do to make her angry.
"I did not mean a coquette, after all," he remarked. "It was not your fault. It was your fatal beauty—your sweet manners that led me on, without your knowledge."

"I am sorry," she replied, "but you can forget me. Men find it very easy to forget."

my time, hoping that your feelings toward me may change."

She shook her head.

"You think so now," he said, "but you can not imagine what may happen to change you. At any rate, I have not yet given up all hope."

By this time the Flying Cloud had plunged her bows rato the Atlante. The prot had taken his have, and the side was booming upon her way and revery thing she could carry.

Captain State walked the quarter stock, relief his less glockly. He was a ground of heart when the whole was fact, and he could be rock on "as neach canvas as held as in Sallady, as a ver, an acceptant poisowas heard abits a costable that made all ions is look up. It was then discovered that a singular accident had taken place. The force quast stallads said boom had broken short off in the middle, and the two parts were swinging about in a furious manner, striking the topsail and making great rents in the canvas.

Let go those halliards!" reared Captain Stubb to Toby Slivers, who was nearest to them.

Then the naturalist, who, as already stated, was nothing of a sallor, was seen to whirl himself round and round in a puzzied fashion, unable to ascertain which was the proper rope.

"Why, Elast your lubberly eyes!" thundered Stubb, and ci poor Toby.

The latter dodged it, just as Turk sprung forward and et the hallards. The wild evolutions of the studling-sail, have received the rope to kink so that it became jammed in the block.

The equal rushed forward like a madman. Slip—slip—ker-waislestesh! boong! boong! There was the studding-sals all careering about the jugged edges of the boom, tearing as good canvas as was ever set.

Tak and soveral other men darted aloft and laid out upon the year, but they were unable to reach the slatting sail, which, whatlag about like a windmill, threatened to knock over any person who should approach within two feet of it.

M movidle, Stubb, below, was beating the rail with his fists, and heading like a familished wolf.

"Excuse me, sir," said Toby Slivers, approaching, "but could you not throw up a rope, lesso-fishion, and catch the sail as they catch will horses?"

"W. lass " reared Stubb. "Why, blast you, man, why ain't got about, helping them on the yard?"

At this, away went Toby, darting up the shrow's fister—fast r—and fister, in his zeal fairly mounting to the topgallant-yard.

Relation rare, the captain alternately shook his fist at the latter and howied to the men, who were vainly trying to see the sell. The latter was doing great damage, for every the fit shated, the sharp, tearing sound of canvas was heard.

All at once the captain stopped beating the rail—stopped howild read stood with mouth and eyes wide open, as a tail figure, sultenly bounding from the forecastle, ran up the fore rigging with the agility of a wild-cat. In one hand this person held a rope, at the end of which was a bowline hitch.

Running out upon the fore yard, he climbed the leech of the topsail, half way, then threw the hitch over one of the parts of the slatting boom and drew it down toward ham, thus in a single instant holding the sail stationary.

A murmur of admiration circulated through the vessel, for the crew had seldom witnessed such an expert feat of during

The kink in the block was now cleared by errorf the men, enabling the adventurous climber to draw the sulf character of the tepsall-yard. The next moment it was on dock, while he was because had secured it stood by, apparently annused by the planes of carprise directed toward him. He was not one of the crew of the vessel—the captain was sure of that. At the same time he acknowledged to himself that he had never seen a more trimly-built man, or one whose whole bearing betckened such easy familiarity with the sea.

Turk and Slivers, descending to the deck, no societ leheld him than their eyes lighted up; but before they could say a word, the new-comer gave them a significant glane.

"Who are you?" cried Stubb. "Wint are you doing here in my craft?"

"Tom Malcolm is my name," answered the other, lowing, and I'm glad to find myself in your ship."

"But I didn't ship ye, my man. Please bear that in mind. You've done me a good turn, though, and to tell the trath, I ain't sorry to have you here, as it's plain you are used to that water."

"I'm ghad that we agree on that point," answered Stoctanchor Tom—for he it was—" and I'll be frank with you and tell you that I could find no other way of gotting oil in your craft, than by stowing myself in your hold, before you cast loose from the pier."

"But what motive had you for wanting to be about of my craft more than any other? Answer me that, my nother?

"Ay, ay, now, but you press me too hard—on a y word you do," answered Tom, "so I must decline answering that question."

"It isn't for mutiny you came, is it?" in paired Stall, he's ing savage.

"It isn't for mutiny," answered Tom, as he brushed from his jacket a cobweb, brought from the hold "Because if it is," continued Stubb, "I'll—I'll have you to know you've got in the wrong craft, and I'll just throw you neck and heels into the sea!"

"That would be hard treatment-it would indeed," said

Tom, knocking the dust from his cap.

"My name is Stubb-you've heard of Captain Stubb, who never would take a word from any man?"

"I have heard of Stubb," replied Tom, wiping, with a piece

" Are you willing to do your duty, my man?"

"Ay, ay, sir, perfectly; try me and see."

- "That's the way to talk. You act your part right, and you'll find I'll act mine. First, though, tell me why you were so anxious to get about lof my craft?"
  - "Because I liked her looks."
  - " That's only half an answer."
  - " I can say no more."
- "What do you think of this matter?" inquired the captain of his first mate.
- "The chap has the right stuff in him, and is worth his weight in gold," replied the first officer, who was an old man; "I've seen many a blue-water chap in my day."
  - "All right. I'll take him. He belongs to your watch."

So saying, the captain walked aft, where Isabel and Mr. Clyde had been interested spectators of what had passed.

The girl and her companion had both seen Sheet-anchor Tom at one and the same moment. Is abeliand colored deeply, and Clyde had noticed her emotion. He had seen her watching the young salor with glances of deep interest, and feeliess of the bitterest rage and jealousy against Tom write a location his surprise at the latter's unexpected appearance. He drew the captain to one side.

" Did that new man ship in your vessel?" he inquire !.

"No; he stowed himself away in my hold. He is a zool sail or, hat I can't imagine why he was so eager to get aboard, my craft."

"Humph! I hope he means he harm," said Clyde, in a low, significant voice.

The captain started, and Clyde's eyes lighted with exultanature, and believed, therefore, that it would be casy to carry out the base plan which he had formed against the young sailor.

"What do you mean, sir? Do you know the man?" inquired Stubb.

"Well, being connected, once, with a shipping concern, I have seen many sailors—this one among the number, and I'm sorry to say I've heard that he is of a quarrelsome nature. One captain informed me that he tried to mutiny abourd his vessel."

Stubb uttered an angry exclamation.

"Let him try any such game abour I this craft, and see what he will get. I shall keep an eye upon him."

" You had better; he'll bear watching."

"Here, you new chap there, forward, come aft Lere and coil up this main-brace!" shouted the captain, to Tom. "Lively, there, jump!"

The words were scarcely out of his mouth, when Tem was aft, colling up the rope with unusual dexterity.

The captain could not hide his a limitation.

"Ay, ay, my man, that's shipshape. Now get a hummer and knock the rust off that ring-bolt by the steerage harch."

Such a task is generally given to a boy, or to some person inclined to shirk duty, and the captain expected that Tom would object, and thus give him (the captain) an expect him to sound his (Tom's) temper, by using harsh words. To his surprise, however, the young sailor proceeded to the work imposed upon him, with the same alterity as he had shown before.

"Why, that chap is every inch a sailor!" thought the side per, "and I'm half a mind to believe my passed or was the taken about there being mutiny in him."

While Tom was at work, Isabel came to his side.

- "I am surprised," she said, in a low voice, "to see y u
- "Well, you see, Miss, I couldn't get a captain's or an officer's berth, and so—so—I hid myself in the hold, and am now foremast hand."

"Oh, Tom, why did you do so?"

"Why, now, if you ask me that," said Tom, coloring deeply, "I must tell you the truth. It was so as to be in the same craft with your beautiful self."

Isabel blushed deeply.

"Please," continued Tom, "not to let captain Stubb know who I am. I wish to travel incog., as I've already told Tark and Slivers."

"I am sorry that I am the cause of your exposing yours it to rough treatment. Captain Stubb, I've heard, is a lard man."

"There's no treatment I wouldn't submit to for the sake of being near you," stammered Tom. "But there's no need of my getting into trouble here. I've sailed, in my time, under worse men than Captain Stubb."

Perceiving that the latter was watching them, and fearing that her presence might make Tom neglect his work and thus excite the skipper's wrath, Isabel turned and walked aft.

Captain Stubb took off his cap and bowed to her.

" B g pardon, Miss, but do you know that man?"

"I have seen him in papa's office," she replied. "He has proved himself a friend to us both."

Stubb opened his eyes wide.

"What kind of a man is he? Not quarrelsome, not mutinous, I hope?"

"No," answered the young girl, decidedly. Then she added, warmly, "He is one of the noblest sailors that ever walked a quarter-deck!"

"A quarter-deck? Why, Miss, begging your pardon, fore-mast hands don't walk quarter-decks."

Isabel perceived that she had made a great blunder—had come near betraying Tom.

"I meant to say deck," she sail. "At any rate, you will find him to be a good man."

The captain left her, wondering at the discrepancy in the two accounts he had heard of Tom. Cly le had said he was quartels ome and mutinous; Isabel had said exactly the contrary.

Meanwhile the young sailor worked away at the ring with great dexterity. After he had knocked the rust from it, he procured some askes and polished it until it shone like silver

"I never saw that fellow's like," said the skipper, when

Tom had gone forward, and he came to inspect the ring. "He does every thing shipshape. I don't know as I'll have reason to feel sorry for his stowing himself away in my hold."

CHAPTER IV.

A DOUBLE TROUBLE.

As day after day passed, the officers all spoke highly of Tom's behavior. In fact, the skipper had come to the conclusion that Clyde was mistaken, and that Isabel was right, when circumstances took place which again roused his suspicions.

Every night a group of men were noticed by the efficer of the watch, gathered forward of the windless. These men conversed in low tones, but the moment the officer we all come near them, they would stop talking and disperse. Among the group, the tall form of Sheet-anchor Tom was always conspicuous.

He seemed the most eager speaker among them, and by Lis gesticulations and confident manner seemed to inche them to the performance of some particular deed.

"What," reasoned the captain, "could this decel be execut matiny?"

He knew that he had made himself olions to many of the men by his tyrannical behavior, and naturally concluded that they were anxious for revenge.

Clyde, to whom he confided his suspicions, did not full to strengthen them by every art in his power. He hanged to see Tom flogged or otherwise disgraced before Isabel.

"Look," he would often whisper to the captain, when Total approached the quarter-deck under pretense of colling a rope, but in reality to be near the fair passenger. "You can see that he is all the time trying to play eavesdropper—to find out if we suspect any thing."

Finally the officers reported that there was grandling foresri, and Clyde declared that he believed Tom was at the to tom of it. The skipper took the alarm, and always slept while a couple of loaded guns near his berth. He ordered his officers to keep a sharp eye upon the young sailor's movements, and immediately report to him every suspicious circumstance.

Now the fact of Tom's associating so much with the group of black-browed men nightly gathered forward, certainly looked suspicious; but if the skipper or his officers could only have beard what was said by the supposed conspirators they would have changed their minds very much respecting him. The truth was that Tom had overheard some of his shipmates, one night, talking about retaliation upon the captain for his severe treatment of them. Their manner at once led him to suspect that they meditated mutiny; so, ever since, he had been using all his powers of persuasion to turn them from their purpose. This was the explanation of his cager manner, his gesticulations, etc., when seen among his evilly-disposed shipmates.

Of one fact Tom was ignorant—of there being a chest containing a large amount of specie stowed away in one corner of the captain's room. Somehow the plotters had heard of this money, and being unprincipled men, the chest and its valuable contents formed an important part in their speculations. They had contrived to suppress all mention of it in Tom's presence, knowing that he would otherwise at once see through their black designs.

One dark night in the middle watch, while the vessel was off the Azores, the captain was waked by stealthy footsteps approaching his door. His lock being out of order, he had secured the door by means of a stout iron bar. Soon he heard the sliding of this piece of iron, and knew that the intruder was endeavoring to force it back by means of some instrument. Unrist through the crevice from the outside.

He snatched one of his loaded guns from the wall, stealthy glided from his bank, and saddenly striking a light with a match at hand, beheld the dark face of one of the foremast hands, who, having just opened the door, stood before him heiling a leng knie in his grasp.

The captain, shouting the alarm, took aim and fire I, but his bullet passed over the head of the mutineer, who beat a rapid retreat. The captain pursued, and though all was darkness, his hand soon came into contact with the tack of a man's neck.

"I have you!" be exclaimed. "You won't escape me easily."

The other, whirling himself clear, caught the captain by the throat, and throwing himself upon him, bore him down at once.

A fierce struggle now ensued, during which the first and second mates appeared, armed with revolvers, and followed by the steward carrying a lantern. The light revealed the captain lying prostrate upon his back, and Shect-anchor Tom holding him firmly.

"Ay, ay, now," cried the latter, starting as he recognized the skipper's face; "this is a queer mistake I've made, but it was all owing to the dark. I didn't dream it was the skipper

I was struggling with."

The first mate pointed his revolver at the speaker's local, while the second officer and the steward glided belief him, and, seizing him unawares, slipped a pair of hand alls over his wrists.

"Caught, you rascal!" cried the captain, springing to his feet. "I've had my eye on you, this long time."

Shect-anchor Tom looked sorely troubled.

"A pretty scrape I've got myself into," he said, "and all for trying to follow up and secure that mutineer. I dire say you think I'm one of the mutineers," he added, addressing the captain.

"There's no disputing that!" criel the skipper, angrily.

" You don't pretend to deny it?"

" Ay, ay, that I do !" answered Tom, " most decilelly."

"Captain—captain, I beg you will release your prisoner! He is innocent!" cried an anxious voice, at this juncture; and Isabel, pale with alarm, opened the door of an adjuint room.

The skipper shook his head. He said he would be clad to comply with any other request from Miss Morton, but that circumvances were too strong against Tom, to leave a doubt to his being in league with the matineers.

"I ma sare you are mistana," said ladel. "I mould gake my life upon his innocence! He can explain his presence here, I doubt not."

As the speaker seemed anxious that he should at once ex plain, Tom proceeded to do so.

He stice I that he had waked half an hour previous, while Iying in his blank, to see two men, provided with long knives, while it is to the fore hold. Suspecting mischief, he spring that his brank and followed them, determined, it possible, to prove the field play. Soon he lost sight of them in the day, is a sepecting that they had made their way into the capin, he does noted the companion-way. As he did so he heard a pan to off and consist a glimpse of a figure rushing past him, up the steps. Before he could seize it, he was grasped from bolded by some person whom he supposed to be one of the moderns, but who, as had just been proved, was the captain.

of it."

So saying, he ordered Tom to be thrust into the run.

As the hatch was fastened above hun, Clyde entered the cabin, looking triumphant.

"I toll you so," he whispered to the captain. "If I were y a I would make an example of him."

Soon after, the matheur at whom the skipper had fired, at I whom he had recognized in the momentary light of his notch, was brought aft, and also thrust into the run.

"The rescals entered the cable," said Stubb, "by displacing a beard from the bulkheads that separate us from the steerage.

I'll set that they are made more strong to morrow."

Il aly the next morning, all hands were called att.

on the less less the quarter-dock, "you know by this time. It a rescally are mpt at muting was made last night. We all there are any among you who field inclined to renew the last might better rive it up.

I shall a proof the two who were cought, an example which you may long remember."

So saying he made a motion to the steward, who, descending into the cabin, soon appeared with the han leathed pris-

UEUTS.

"If you have any thing to say for yourselves, say it now," remarked the captain, ad iressing the two men.

Both remained silent. Tom's check was red with anger, and his eyes flashed. The other man looked dark and sallen.

Old Turk stepped forth, and scraping the deck with his night foot, confronted the skipper.

" Beggin' your pardon, sir, I can stake my life that Tem

"To your place!" roared the captain. "What do you know about it?"

"Go back, Turk," said Tom, decidedly. "Don't get yourself into trouble on my account."

The old man obeyed; but there was a glare in his eyes which threatened interference when matters should come to a point.

At that moment Isabel came on deck. At sight of the preparations that were going on, her check pale land her eyes flashed. She at once comprehended that the captain intendition seize (fasten) Tom in the rigging, and thay him with the cat-o'-nine-tails.

"It's too bad," said Clyde, coming to her side and speaking with pretended sympathy. "I never thought it would come to this."

"It shall not," she firmly answered.

Then she walked straight up to the skipper and looked him full in the face.

"You have no right to punish this man," she said, firm'y; "he is innocent."

"Really, ma'am," answered Stubb, "I must differ with you."

"Flogging is against the law," she replied. "You have

The capt din colored and bowel awkwardly.

"I know my duty," he said, "and most do something to prevent my officers and passengers from being markered."

So saying, he motioned to his mates, who at once proceded to take off Tom's handcuffs and strip him of his shirt.

The young man said not a word, but his lips were compressed with determination.

His upper garment was hardly off when, suddenly striking out right and left, knocking aside the two mates, he bounded to the rail and sprung overboard. He was an expert swimmer, and at once struck out for the shore, half a learne distant "Clear away the quarter-boat !" thunderel Stubb.

The Loat was soon in the water, gaining rapidly upon the swimmer.

"Pail-pull, you raseals," growled the captain, who stood up in the stern-sheets of the boat; "one more stroke and we have him."

As he spoke, Tom dove, and passing under the boat, came up far astern. Stubb, however, whirling the light craft quickly round, soon overtook him. He was seized, hauled into the lost, handestied, and brought back to the ship.

I. .' cl. who had noted every thing, again interfered.

any good, though I'm much obliged to you, all the same. It's hard for an honest man to be florged, but I can bear it after a fishing as long as I know you be not believe me guilty"

"Humph!" muttered Clyde, who stood not far off. "What miserable affectation of innocence."

Tom, who was quick of bearing, heard the remark.

"S a lara!" he exclaimed, turning saddenly toward the clark, "I'm not suspicious, by any means, but, upless I'm much mist don, you, sir, are the cause of all my tradice."

"I will not be insulted, in this manner, by a verabond," s.il Clyde. "Ceptain, will you permit your possengers to be to be the better by a color of the latest pour vessel?"

dresses his mates. "Put the other calculated there, also!"

The truth was, the captain, who was somewhat abashed by the indiention Isabel had shown at his treatment of Tom, condition that it was best to put off the the congruent milerial, when he might perform his work with at any witnesses besides the seamen.

Is bell, who believed that he had decided to force his brutal intentions, seemed much relieved. Clyde, on the contrary, frowned and but his lips, for, as mentioned, his principal motive for wishing Tom to be flogged was to see him discreted before the young girl.

The captain did not mention his intentions to any person. When midnight came, he stepp I on deck and or level the officer of the watch to turn up all hands without noise. He was promptly obeyed, and the men came aft, to that Tourish the mutheer there, surrounded by the mates who had stelling brought up the prisoners.

"Now, then, to your work," said the captain, in a law voice, as lanterns were hear up in the mizzen-rigging. "This man has in the pointing at Tom.

The young man's handcuffs were taken off, and his wrists were exized to be tied to the ringing. He pain I then asked, and, quick as lightning, which I himself are red, for a los persecutors. Instably, one of the mates point, had all the volver at his head.

"Better stay where you are. One step and you if p!"

"Ay, ay; but you may as well fire off your pisted, "ow you've been at the trouble of loading it!" cried Ton, as as bounded from the group.

The officer did not fire; but his brother mates the attention selves upon the young man and brought ham built.

"Mercy is a good thing in its place," said Tem, specime to the man with the revolver; "but I would nather you had fired, as I should have preferred being shot to being the gradual."

"Come—away with him and tie him up!" come tair, as a low murmur of approval circulated and are the men.

Tom now was hurried, to the mizz natinging; but as list wrists were being tied, he jaked them assay, and that again confronted the mates.

man, flir and sprary upon my breast?"

At this, the crew cheered, and drew near to the mirror of ging. The experim turned puls with alarm.

"Q.i.d., do your work!" he sail to his mates

Accordingly, they were proceding to entre the picture the its ins, which will not Tolk was bord

"Whatsy you, man, will you per it he?"

The captain placed at the speaker and turn I very pale as cries of "No-no!" resounded along the line

"Matiny !" he shouted. "Steward! stewar!! the musket?"

The cries grew louder: the men drew nearer.

"Shipmates!" cried Tom, "keep back! Don't get your-selves into trouble for me!"

The men, however, now were half mal with excitement.
One of them wrenched the mate's revolver from his grasp before he could fire.

"No flogging here!" cried several; "cut down the two

The captain and mates found themselves surrounded by twenty stout fellows.

Two of these seized the captain, and throwing him down, 61: drew a knife to cut his throat.

" Hold!" chiel Turk, " no murder in this craft!"

The two men heeded him not. The edge of the keen steel already touched the skipper's throat, when the voice of Sheet-aucher Tom was heard ringing through the ship.

"Av.st, there, mates, what are you about? As sure as there is a God above us this ship goes to the lottom the motion there is a marder committed about of her!"

The voice, the manner, more than the more words, startled and awal the matineers. Tem knew well how to operate upon the separations fours of sallors. The worst of the Laraneers being the most ignorant, were, as a natural consequence, the most afficied by this speech.

The man with the knite drew back and permitted the skipper to rise. At the same moment several of the men Cut the listings that held Tom to the rigging.

"We will take the snip!" exclaimed one of the crew.

Half a dozen of his shipmates echoed the cry: the rest booked at Tom, as if whiting for his decision upon the matter.

"No," he exclaimed, "that must not be. All we want is listice. If the captain and his officers will agree to treat us have men we will return to duty."

"Ay, ay, they must promise thet," exclaime I several.

"Very well, I promise," sail Stabb, "for mys if an lodicers."
Soon, it was evident that he sail this simply to gain time.
Many quickly among those men who had wished to take the up, he said a few words to them in a low voice, when,
to the surprise of their shipmates, the would be matheers, Arming themselves with handspikes, crowlears and other implements, ranged themselves on the side of the captain and his officers!

The truth was that the skipper, who understool the scrill natures of these wretches thoroughly, had person belief that to join him by promising a reward in gold. His purty new numbered tourteen, while there were but seven of the others.

"Knock 'em down! capture 'em-capture all the raseals!"

roared Stubb, his eyes glaring with exultation.

Upon the seven men the larger party now prepared to rush, yelling like tigers.

The smaller gang were ranging themselves by the side of Sheet-anchor Tom, when the young salor so blenly was knocked senseless by a blow from behind with a hand-spike.

He who dealt this cowardly stroke then ran aft and descended into the cabin; not, however, before the man at the wheel had recognized him as the passenger, William Clyb.

Isabel, hearing the disturbance on deck, had dressed herself and come into the state-room.

"What is the matter?" she inquired, much alurach.

"Don't disturb yourself," said Clyde, "it is nothing. The captain is only putting down some of the men who wished to take the ship."

He had no sooner spoken than the skipp r was hearl, rearing out to the steward to bring up a whole string of handcuffs.

Clyde then returned to the deck to find two of the seven men, besides Tom, lying senseless, and the rest surrounded and held in the grasp of the captain's party. The stead is brought the han leads, and the three prostrate men recovering their senses, the whole seven were thrust into the run.

The skipper then distributed the reward, when the traiters walked forward, cheering him.

Their zeal was not of long duration. Early next in thing a farious gale princed upon the ship, driving her stright toward the high class of one of the Azores. By tracing the years, the rocks might have been avoided; but the normalised to obey orders takes the captain gave than some more money. The danger being imminent, they hap I in this way to extract funds from him.

The captain assured them that he had no more money, when they spoke of the chest in the cabin.

"That is not mine," he said; "it belongs to a Liverpool firm."

He grew pale as he noticed their greedy looks. They could easily overpower him and his officers if so disposed. He consulted with his mate, who convinced him that all the men in the run should be set free. There was no other way to save the ship.

to put the best men in the run. Things were worked round in a queer fashion."

Stubb owned that they were, and concluded that he would set the prisoners free, as it was his only resource to save his craft.

Accordingly the seven were liberated, and informed that if they would turn to and do their duty, there would be no more trouble. He even went so far as to own to Sheet-anchor Tom that he had mistaken his character, and now felt sure, from his late conduct, that he had not been in league with those who wished to mutiny.

"All right," answered Tom. "I'm willing to do my duty as long as I'm treated well."

The liberated men braced the yards just in time, the vessel barely escaping the edge of the rocky island. Ahead, however, there was a reef stall to be passed, and it seemed doubtful if the ship could lay up close enough to clear it.

. White with alarm, Isabel peered through the companion-way.

"Do you think we can clear it?" inquired Clyde, of the captain.

"God only knows," he replied. "Luff, luff, there at the wheel !"

The man endeavored to obey, but the power of the seas prevented his moving the helm.

"We are lost !" muttered the mate.

At that moment a tall figure bounded past him. It was She trancher Tem, who, now confronting the captain, offered to save the ship, if permitted to take the helm.

"Very well, my man; but no human power can save the

Tom then sprung to the helm, and to the surprise of all put it "hard up" instead of "hard down."

The first consequence of this maneuver was the falling off of the ship, so that she drove straight for the center of the line of reef-rocks!

A cry of dismay sounded from every lip except Turk's The old sailor swung himself up on the rail by the main shrouds, and stood looking ahead with more curiosity than fear. As to the captain, he darted aft, his whole face convulsed with anger and astonishment.

"Good God, man! Look out! look out! What are you doing?"

Tom answered not a word, but quietly pointed ahead, at the same time meeting the craft by putting his wheel down a little, so as to keep her steady.

All eyes being turned toward the recf, Tom's intention was made apparent. He had put up the helm in order to direct the ship into a strong current running parallel with the line of rocks, and commencing near the center! Caught by this current, the ship was now whiled rapidly along past the recf and round that only of it opposite to the one which the captain had intended to weather.

In a worl, Tom's daring feat—one which many good seimen might have hesitated to perform—saved the craft.

All hands cheered; and came crowding round their preserver, shaking hands with him.

"You have saved my ship," said Stubb, "you, who, I thought, had plotted to take it from me. I'll keep my weather-eye open hereafter, and be careful how I condemn a man."

Isabel, smiling and blushing with pleasure, also came to thank Tom. She felt very glad that he had reinstated himself in the good opinion of the officers. There would be no more trouble for him, she was sure.

CHAPTER V.

OFF AGAIN.

A FORTNIGHT after the incident last described, the Flying Cloud arrived at her destined port. Soon a loat was lowered to take the passengers ashore. Tom stood looking rather said and downcast for him, when Isabel come to bid him good by. She gave him her hand, and as he clasped it he trembled all over.

" F rewell, my best of friends," she sai i.

"Isabel," he stammered, and his eyes grow moist in spito of him, " I--"

He had intended to tell her, there and then, how much he loved her. The quarter-deck was deserted by ad except these two, and he believed he would never have another chance to say what he wished. But the harge, soft eyes were again upon him, and his courage gave way. He helped her into the boat; then stood watching it until it was out of sight, believing that he should never see its fair occupant again.

A few days later he and Turk received their discharge, and with Toly Slivers, the naturalist, took up their quarters in the —— Hotel. Meanwhile Clyde, having been decidedly rejeted a second time by Isabel, resolved to return to America. His love for the young girl was now turned to the bitter st hate. He was a man who always hated those who did n i comily with his wishes.

The cide t dangher of the friend with whom Isadel was steping, married soon after Mi's Morton's arrival. She was a data, suspicious, judous girl, and felt uneasy whenever she locked at health'd Isadel. Her hashand, she thought, could not help so ing the contrist between her and the beautiful American. The result of this facing was, that Isadel had not larg remained at her new quarters, when she was intermed that the whole family were sorry to part with her, but that they must do so, as they were going to make a tear on the continent.

So Isabel packed up her slender stock, and left, not knewing now where she should next lay her head. Her indistance very low, so that she must look up some very cheap lodging-house. She saw several, but they were of some bidding aspect that she passed on.

Twilight was approaching, the wind blew cold, and the dust, sweeping into her face, almost blanded her.

Night close I around her, and not having yet form I a line ing place, she lost her way. She became quite all mod, when she noticed on the opposite side of a lanely strong the till figure of a man, who seemed watching her. She hard along, when the man, crossing, appreached her, respecting lifting his hat.

Then she recognized Sheet-anchor Tem.

"Ay, ay, Miss Merton, I'm glad to see you—I am in led?" he said, coloring in the bashful way usual to him when speaking to her.

She shook bands with him corlially, and expressed the sincere joy she felt at meeting him.

"I have often thought of you," she sail, frankly; "and always with feelings of the deepest gratitude, for the all liess you have shown me."

"Thought of me?" Le exclaimel, alally. "Now that makes me very happy—it does inded, Mass Morton!"

He spoke so fervently that she was a little fright hel, and hastened to change the subject, intoming him what she was looking for, and that she hed lost her way.

"If you will come with me," sail Tom, quite jeff lat the idea of rendering her as rvice, "I will show you ask by little place which, I doubt not, you will litte."

She complied with his request, and he soon conducted her to a small, neat brick tenement looking-house, kept by an old bely with whom he was slightly requalitied. Is ded was shown to a confortably-funcished apartment.

"Do you wish to hire by the month or the quater?" in-

"I don't know as I shall remain here a react," she answered, knowing that her money would scarcely, with the most rigid economy, hold out that length of time, unless she were able to procure employment.

The old lady followed Sheet-anchor Tom to the door.

"Now, then, be careful of her, for she is used to the best," said the young sador, as he slipped a ten-pound note into her hand. "See that every thing is well cooked, and sent up at the right time. Let her have a chicken, do you see, several times a week, and when the money is some, why just let me know, but don't say a week about my giving you the fands."

The all hely promised compliance, and Tom lett.

I del was sequised the next morning at the rather costlylooking breakfast sent up to her.

"Indeed," she said to the old hely, "I don't think I should have ordered quite such an expensive med."

"You won't find it very expensive, after all," answered the

Every day Isabel was surprised by the excellence of the meals at the dame's lodging house. She requested the old hely to let her know if she heard of any chance for a governess or for equies. The woman reported her wishes to Tom, when she next saw him. A few days later, the young sailor send up a request to Isabel to see her. She readly complied, when, put it go not of manuscript upon the table, he informed her tast he had obtained copying for her to do, at so much perpage.

The truth was that Tom Lad procured, for a small consideration, a whole chestfull of waste law manuscripts, chough to last Isobel for a year. He had no local to use a few homologies of his own maney to pay her so much a week for copying the papers, while pretending—it was the first deception. Tom fact ever practiced in his hil—that he had obtained the work from a lawyer.

Isa of was delighted with the work, especially as the saley—a manifecut one for copying—we all enable her to pay her board, and have a few delians to space.

Somether conveyers the manuscripts to Isabel, Tom saw Listan I Turk, who was now employed upon a Liverpool coal-schooner.

- "Tark," sail be, "I am color away."
- "Av, ay, sir-Tim of with you, of course."
- " No; you must stay here as paying-clerk."
- " As what?" inquired Turk.

Tom explained about the manuscripts, and made the old sailor understand that he wanted to intrust him with a certain sum of money out of which he might pay Isakel her weekly wages for copying, during his (Tom's) absence.

"I shall not be gone I nger than seven months," said the young man. "I am going to the place where the M. or was wrecked, and endeavor to fish up the jewes about, which you know were very valuable—worth many thousands of dollars!"

Tark double I his firsts and brought them down upon the table in front of him with great force.

"Ay, ay!" he exclaimed, "that'll be a hat! worth trying for. It would do my old heart good to see the por girl gat that treasure."

"I'll get it for her if I die in the attempt," answere! Tom.
"Night and day, the poor thing worries herself because she has not yet been able to save a cent toward paying her father's debts."

"I will help you!" cried Turk, "all I can. I will stay and carry out for you that plan of payin' her the weekly salary. She is a good gal, and desarves it."

The two men parted, Turk going toward the dicks, and Tom to seek a vessel for the intended expedition.

The old sailor had not proceeded for when Le met Clyle, who held out his hand. Tank did not group it very estimy, as he had always felt for the clerk a strong reing of disable.

"How is your thier. !?" in paire! Cryde. "She t-an h r Tom?"

"Well," answered Turk, dryly.

"Does he intend to slak any more ships?" inquired the other, smiling.

"What do you mean?" queried Turk, anguly.

"Oh, well, you know there was the Meteor. He smk her, and-"

"You must be a parfect labber, Mr. Clyde, to say that. The Meteor's sinking wasn't Tem's fault. Besides, he's give to fish up the vallebles that was in her, do you see, and give 'em to Miss Isabel."

"Umph! A good idea—a very good idea," muttered Clyde. "When is he going to start?"

"Don't know; pretty soon I think, as he's looking up a Cly le then bade the old man a hurried farewell and left Lim. He had made up his mind in an instant that Isabel should never get the je vels in the sunken ship. She had, by refrsing him, excited his late, and now he was determined, if I' e l'te, to thwart the benevolent intentions of Sheet-anch a Tom. He knew that, at that period, the fruitfal, pleasant shores of Brazil were infested by bands of lawless men, calling themselves beach-combers-deserters from vessels--who would scarcely hesitate at any crime promising rich pecuniary I : "I's. Clyde, therefore, resolved to take passage as soon as possible, for Rio Janeiro, thence make his way to the coast cif which the Meteor was wrecked, and engage the services of some of the beach-combers, who, he doubted not, could of tain the chest of jewels before Tem's arrival, thus defrau ling the rightfal owner. Clyde would then give the workmen a large share of the treasure for payment, and reserve the "lion's portion" for himself.

Entering a shipping-office, he ascertained that no vessel would be ready for Rio Janeiro in less than three weeks from that time.

This irritated him; Tom, perhaps, would obtain a craft before this period, and thus get ahead of the schemer. In fact, the young sailor had aheady formal a ship—the Dolphin—which, with a little repairing, would answer his purpose. The owner gave him every facility to proscente his work, so that he heped to be ready for sailing in a fortnight.

One hight, just after the workmen employed had quitted the vessel for the day, he was sented in the cubin smoking a cigar, when a possible smell, as of something burning, soluted his nestly. He rose quickly, and shabbling up a bubble passed late the sherine, where he at once perceived a thing smalle. A chellion in the was some head, and glandar toward a comer, he discovered that a long bunch of oak in there was in thomas. Not for from this there were several barrols of tar and colls of tarred rope. If these were ignited there would be but lattle hope of saving the vessel.

Tom, believing himself the only man in the ship, hurried on deck and procured a large bucket of water and a roll of canvas. Wetting the latter, he threw it over the flames, an soon extinguished them. At the same moment, however, he saw tongues of flame shooting up from the fore-latt!

This circumstance at once excited his saspecions, and he darted forward in time to get a glimpse of the ordine of a man's figure scrandling from the hold.

Quickly extinguishing the fire with the curvas, he hard I so putsuit of the figitive, who, now springing upon the rail. I upod to the dock and made off. Tom pursued but so a lost sight of the criminal, who disappeared among the black shadows of the crooked streets.

Wondering who the incendiary could be, and what his reasons were for setting fire to the ship, Tom returned. The more he reflected upon what had just happened, the more he was puzzled. Certainly, the man must have been insure, an escaped lunatic, he thought, to make such an attempt. On the next day he spoke about it to the owner, who shock his head significantly.

"Depend upon it," said he, "the incendiary was one of my enemies; for, like most all business-men, I have enemies, sir, who would not hesitate to kill me if they dired. I shall try to probe this matter and find out the guilty party, though I doubt if I shall succeed."

A week later the Dolphin was ready for sea. Tom had shipped a good crew, and resolved to take with him Toly, the naturalist, who could make himself useful in the calin.

On the day fixed for sailing, the young salor repaired to Isabel's locking to bit her farevell. She was busy with ler man scripts at the time, but she received him with or an Y.

"I am going away," sail Tom. "My ship Sales in a lew hours. Good-by, Miss Morton."

His voice was a little hasty and he twirled his cap uncusir as he spoke.

"Will year be good to se" inquired Ist'al.

" Not a year, I think; though I won't be certain"

Then he informed her of the arrangement he had make with Tank to pay her her weekly salary.

"You need not have taken so much trouble," she replied "Were you to inform me of the name and place of business.
of the lawyer, I could call upon him myself."

Tom colored and was much embarrassed.

"He—he—lives a long ways off," he stammered. "Ay ay, so far off that it would tire you to death to get to him."

"I am sure you are very-very kind, to take so much pains for me," she said.

"It isn't pries at all," answered Tem; "it's only pleasure, do you see? What wouldn't I do for you, Mas?" he added, giving his cap a long twirk.

He also looked at her shyly, but with such a flash of pow-end i bore in his eyes that Is bel's droeped.

as he felt, was the first to break silence.

"God leby," Le repeated, "and may God bless you and take care of you, Miss, while I'm gone."

She give him her hand, and he felt it tremble in his grasp. He I oked at her and perceived that her eyes were lowered, her checks quite pale. Her manner was exceedated to inspire him with more self-pessession than he had ever yet felt in her presence, and his heart grew contageous. He would tell her that he loved her, and learn his fate before he sailed.

"I. lei-Miss Morton," he said, "I am going away; but, before I go. I wish to tell you that I am sorry—ay, ay, migray serry, to leave one whom I love more than-"

The large, soft eyes were lifted to his face. They looked at him canaly and carnestly, and the words he had wished to say died upon his lips.

"You need not be afraid to name her to me," said I stel,

"So does not even guess who I mean," thoo ist Tom, so read, in the "so we produce what her cover would be "if I told her."

"Ay. ay," he said about "I know you wouldn't, butint-in you say, I've count I my minimale at saying what I was going to."

"Oh, very well," she answered.

They shock hands, he said good-by, and had nearly reached the door, when upon the floor he saw a ribben which had dropped from her hair.

He picked it up, and involuntarily pressed it to his light. Isabel colored deeply, while Tom felt so much confused at.

what he had done that for several minutes he was mable to speak a word.

At last he gave her the ribbon.

"Here," said he, "take it, and pardon me for what I did My only excuse is that I couldn't help it. Take the rider, unless you are willing to make me a present of it to carry of with me to sea."

"Certainly; you may keep it if you wish," she replied.

"Ay, ay, that's kind of you," he said, as he carefully partie piece of silk in an inside pocket—"and now I will are."

"You must know," she added, smilling, "that when yet commence a speech, I have a right to hear the end of it."

"So you have," replied Tom, "but-but-do you see, I-"

" Nay, I will hear no denial," she said, blushing.

She looked at him with those earnest eyes, and Tom could not say a word. He again twirled his cap in confusion.

"Good-by, Miss Morton," he finally said, "and many—: y thanks for that little ribbon."

The next moment he was gone.

He repaired directly to his ship, aboard which he found Turk, waiting to bid him farewell. The two friends soon parted, the anchor was litted, and the ship, catching the land-breeze, as her topsails were sheeted, bowled merrily up a her course.

In due time she arrived at Rio Janciro, where her extent remained, laying off and on a few days to procure a same of fresh water. He then stood along the coast, and some in the late at the bay in which the Meteor was suck. He had not a same at the wing of the place, soon after the wrock, and had a same at the wrock, and had a same at

Some her for the wheek, he so n felt it and an here to a tit. The underenant had consell it along toward he shale; but the water was deep enough for his craft. Accordingly be got up tackles at once, and went to work. Two or three goed divers whom he had shipped, plunged into the clear depties, and were soon on the wreck. They were obliged to dive three or four times before ascertaining that the chest of jewels was not in its former place.

"Are you sure, lads?" inquired Tom, " are you sure that you looked in the after-part of the east room?"

"Ay, ay, sir," was the response.

To a begin to fear that others had been before him in security that the transition of the writers, however, the list that the cast was still in the wrick, but that the water had swept it into some other part of the craft.

About the time that Tom was scatching for the surken with Clyric arrived, in a Liverpool steamer, at Rio J. cho.

On the next day he took passers in a lettle Portuguese scheme, bound along the coast, and landed within twenty the coast, and landed within twenty the coast, and landed within twenty the coffice spot where Tom's ship was anchored. Ahead of then, another groves of gigantic trees, where the chass was long and grown, and curious tends chattered and six any dishe lived by there were many rubely-constructed hats, near which stellwaft men were seen loanging upon the sward, smoking their place. Clyck wided toward them, and so day himself that grown the name of Jim Jones, remarked that it was a pleasant day.

"His clauss pleasant in these perts, except when there's truck es," answered the other, gradily.

Then he scratinized the young man from her! to foot.

"How come gon here?" he mquired, "and what may you want? Have you any money?"

"I have no money, my fliend, but I know a way to make play."

The other's eyes glistened.

" How ?"

In a few words Civde explained about the wreck of the M. ' rand word on to speak about the chest of jewels.

"And you thank I can fish 'em up before the rightful owner on sufer 'em?" is quited the man.

"Yes, by a little hard work."

"Then I'm not your man," answere I the other, curling I, s lip. "We get plenty to cut and dank here without workled her! for it, the jewels are not worth the trouble it would take to get 'em."

Clyle, who had thought that the man would jump at his proposal, moved away disappointed, and sprie to others on the subject. He consulted the whole gang—twenty men in all—but could find no one willing to undertake the job. These men were the laziest fellows he had ever met with. He stood motio desapheanting as to what he should do next, when the man whom he had first ad bessel called to him.

"I tell ye what," sail the beach comber, "the rightful caner is arready a lishing for the jewels, if it was his court I saw in the bay below he a two days ago."

"What was the vestel's mane?" asked Clyde.

Being informed, he knew at once that Tem had arrived. He fairly ground his teen with blit relisuppointment.

- "By the way, how mach might them jewels be worth?" inquired the man.
  - " About one hundred thousand dell as !"
- "What?" and the beach-comber spring to his feet, shouting,
  "A prize, men—a prize of one hundred thousand dollars?"
  - " Ay, with Lard work," was the sullen response.
- "No, no, we won't have to work at all!" cried the giant, "except perhaps in the way of a little fighting."

And the beach comber drew a long sheath-krife from his belt, and flourished it round his heat.

"Yes, men," he continued, "we will wait until the captains of the saip sets up the jewels, and then—"

His mised cyc-brows and the glance he directed from unler them, were significant to all.

Clyde was exultant; at the same time, being a poor man, he was anxious to pocket his share of the prize.

"You shall have two-thirds of the profits to divide and gon," he sand, "and I will take the rest."

At this there was a coarse burst of laughter, and Clyle for me that there was no hope of his obtaining a single jewel when once the chest was in the possession of the gargest beach-combers.

"Why, you young I tober!" cried the first speaker, "jot you was yourself off, as soon as you can, unless you can to help us in the attack, when of course we'll let you have some butle tritle for your pairs."

"I will help you," answered Clyde.

"Well, now, you are good grit, at any rate," said the beach-comber, "and we'll be glad to have you with us, as we are short-handed. We do not number more than twenty, while

On the next day, while Sheet-anchor Tom stood upon the party dock directly his divers, a man—one of the beach-care as—one along-ide in a skiff, with a local of finite which he offered for sale.

the larger this ship, and while disposing of his state, or my ser this latter were just rising to the surface of the parties which they had dived a few minutes previously.

" Well," sired Tom, "any thing this time?"

" Ay, ay," was the response, "we've found it."

The crew cheered.

"Clear away the tackles!" shouted Tom.

Accordingly the tackles were cleared, and the chain hooks towered under water.

The divers planged beneath the surface once more, to re-

The men scize I the rope, and in a few minutes the valuatic chest, covered with mud and sand, was hoisted aboard. In the mud, Toby Slivers noticed a mander of little insects, In it inclosed in blue shells, resembling those of snails. With his latie he picked out these curious insects and deposited tions in his box, notch delighted with his acquisition. The hock counter now left the ship, and repaired to his countales with the news of what he had seen.

"I.I you count the crew?" inquired the leader of the

" Yes-twenty-five."

"And we are twenty-one. We can manage matters if we sork right."

Night closed darkly around the ship. Two nien form !

n lene all were the only wa'chers aboard.

"What's that?" inquired one of those on the knightheads,

I be a directly about.

the jill-boom and peered throught he heard a faint splash, as of a paddle striking the water. He listened intently, but soon even this noise was stopped.

"It can be nothing, after all," he thought, "but a fish, wheeling along through the sea."

He returned to the deck, and was conversing with his shipmate, when the latter, suddenly pausing, clutched him by the arm.

" Hark P'

A noise, as of something pounding under the ship's hows, was hear I. Both men crawled upon the knighther is, and peared over, but were unable to see any thing. In fact, the water under them was vailed by a shadow of intense blackness.

"A wave striking the craft, probably," said one of the men; and both returned to the deck.

At intervals they heard that low, pounding note, which, however, still sounded so much like that made by a reliary billow, that they gave it no particular attention.

Soon the noise was hushed, but it was followed by a curious surgling, like that of a drowning man.

"A whirlpool sweeping past the ship," said one of the look-outs.

The noise continuing, proved that it was caused by sensething else.

One of the men, procuring a lantern, held it over the lows, when they noticed that the water under them was containing a lanted, as if from some disturbing influence beautiful.

They concluded, however, that it was consoling part of a sunken rock having given way, the water robust is the cavity. Soon they were alarmed by a reming soon has of a torrent penning into the hold. Again they as I the have to when one of them, with an exchanation, pointed to the list stay. This, which had higherto occupied a positional water, now was submerged nearly a fact! Nor was this infor, watching it keenly, the men perceived that it was sinking deeper and deeper every moment. In truth, there was no longer any doubt of a very startling fact—the vessel was setting by the head!

The look-outs gave the alarm, and up came all hands, Sheet-anchor Tom the first man.

He ordered a boat lowered, lanterns were provided, and he pulled under the vessel's bows.

"There is a hole in the craft," said he, turning to the ship's carpenter, who was with him; "see if you can feel it."

The carpenter, using his sounding-rod, discovered that there was an aperture about three feet under water.

"It must have been lately made," he said, "but I can not imagine by what."

"A sworl-fish could not have done it," said Tom. "Some human being has been at work making the mischief."

All efforts to stop up the opening were useless. The water continued to pour into the hold, and in a short time the ship's bows were salmerged almost to her sprit-sail yard. Then a grating noise was heard, and with a sudden thump, her keel toward settled upon a rock under water.

"Ay, ay, now, this is too bad!" cried Sheet-anchor Tom.

"Just as we have succeeded in getting the chest, too! It will this us a long time to get the craft clear."

As he spoke, one of the men uttered a low exclamation, and pointed to the right. All eyes were instantly turned in that direction, when the outlines of a number of dim forms approaching, became visible. The stealthy dip of paddles was also heard.

"Aloy, there!" shouted Tom. "Who are you?"

There was no response. The noise of the paddles continuel a few minutes longer, then ceased, while the dim figures previously seen vanished in the darkness like so many phantoms.

Sheet-unchor Tom, intending to board his vessel at once, gave or less to his men to pull him round to the gangway. Lest as he spoke, the sound of several pistol-shots was heard bllowed by grouns and cries of alarm. These noises were showed by the quick trampling of fect, the thug of blows given and tree ivel, and other evidences of a struggle.

"This is a range enough!" cried Tom. "What has put it cree my men to quarrel?"

"Contain!" exclaimed his first mate, clambering over i to the information of come quick! We are boarded! A set of the through of some kind or other have boarded us by way of the same, and have attacked us!"

This announcement filled Tom with astonishment.

" Lively, men-follow me!" he shouted, as the Lout gill!

· alongside the gangway.

He was soon aboard with his boat's crew. His men on deck had been driven forward, and were en leavening to detect themselves against the assaults of a number of register king men, whose faces, lighted by the glare of the ship's lantern, were distinctly visible.

"The muskets!" whispered Tom to his mate; "make haste and bring them. There are some in the calin."

The mate starte I, but before he could return, Tem and his companions were furiously attacked by twice their number. In fact, the assailants having succeeded in killing and worn ing several of the ship's crew, and in securing half a degree of the others by harling them into the main held and factoring the hatches above them, were now in the majority. Its may be imagined, these men were the leach-conders, who, having dispatched one of their number to scattle the saip from the outside, and thus prevent the possibility of her genting under way, had afterward pulled round to her stern in the dark, and boarding her, as shown, supprised her crew.

Tom and his little party, picking up handspikes, derived themselves as well as they could, retreating, meanwhile, ward the cabin. From this the mate now emerged with the muskets, which he had carefully loaded.

"Ay, ay, men, now is your time; arm yourselves at laint these tellows what they deserve!" cried Tom, as he shat they one of the weapons.

Taking aim at the head of the foremest of the assail a party, he fire i, when the man tumble I backward to the docu. His companiors, whose arms consisted only of knives at his backs, then turned and field forward, to join their companions, then were provided with pistors.

The crasiling of the muskets and smaller flue-arms, to the with the shorts and shricks of the back-combus, n.w.n.

terrific din.

Both parties fought with desperation, and where retighting was the hardest there Shret-ancher Tem was a rebe found, dealing powerful blows with his muchet, which has had not the time to reload. He cheered and encouraged his men with all his might; but the assailants so far outnumbered him and his han lful of shipmates, that the latter were soon overpowered, and made prisoners. Tom, with his back to the foremast, was not yet taken. Attacked by half a dozen of his chambs, he still parried their blows with his music to Parally the Lorente Jim Jones, gliding alongside of him, pointed a couple of pistols at his head.

"You're good grit, young man," said he, "and it goes : ;"in heart to killye. Surrender or you're a gone goose!"

As he spoke, one of his companions knocked Tom down will a blow upon the heal from a stick of wood.

The captain, somewhat bewildered, endeavored to rise, but infine he could do so, he was thrown upon his back and tied "hand and foot."

What do you want?" he inquired, as Jim Jones held a lantern above his held. "Why have you boarded my ship and attacked my crew?"

"Praps you'll know before this time to morrow. You can't say I've been unmarciful to you though, seeing as me and my band has only killed three of your fellows. All the rest has been wounded or tumbled into the hold, where we must now put you, my gallant captain."

As he spoke, a figure was seen to clamber over the rail and slowly approach. The lantern's light, falling full upon this person, revealed William Clyde.

At sight of him Tom uttered a cry of surprise.

"Ah!" cried Jones, with a sneer, "so you've come at last."

" For my share of the jewels, certainly."

"Ay, but where mought you have been while the fightin' was a-goin on?"

"I-I was taking care of the canoes, of course. You

"Note the of it, seeing as they were fastened to the step tensor we bear bit?" cried Jones, sternly. "Now, then, syra said it it, you may just bout ship and go back to a substance, as you won't get any thing of the treasure."

"B", that was the agreement!" exclaimed Clyde, turning pale with rage and mortification. "I was to have my share!"

"If you helped us fight yes; but as you did not-"

" How do you know I did not?"

"We all know it!" exclaimed one of the beach-combers; several of us had our eyes on you, at intervals, during the fight. I saw you skulking in one of the canoes!"

" Pitch him overboard!" cried another voice.

"Ay, ay, over with him!" was echoed on all siles.

"No, no; shoot the rascal!" criel a flerce, hazzar! man, weating ragged pants and a slouched felt Lat; "that's the way to serve cowards!"

As he spoke, he pointed a loaded pistol toward Civde and discharged it.

The ball passed through the young man's neek, and he fell, dying, alongside of Tom.

"Give him water!" said the latter, who could not view the agonies of the struggling wretch without pity. "Qilk, lear a hand! See how his eyes are roding in his heal!"

One of the beach-combers brought some water to the sufferer, who, slightly reviving for a few minutes, now confised to Sheet-anchor Tom, all the injeries he had secretly inflated upon him.

In making this acknowledgment, he was probably influenced by the only real pang of remorse he had ever felt, for the pitying eyes of Tom, bent upon his face, waltened a spark of genuine good feeling in his heart.

The captain was surprised to hear that all the treatile he had experienced aboard the Flying Cloud, had been causal by Clyde's poisoning the skipper's mind archist him. He also learned that the injurious reports which had prevented his obtaining command of a ship original defeat to the Liverpool deck, was made by an agent from Clyde; and now, to crown all, Tom was informed that the life at a upon his saip was also sage to lay his persevering chemical

Show a termoding his confession, Clyde breathed his in when, with well its attached to his flet to make him soil, he was launched overboard.

Tom, being then thrust into the hold with the reter the prisoners, Jim Jones at once commenced a starch for the valuable chest. He ransacked the vessel fore and after the was unable to find what he looked for. Accordingly he oprung into the hold, pistol in hand, and confronting Sheet-anchor Tom, commanded him to tell where he had secreted the chest.

"Never," answered the young captain, quietly; "that chest is for a poor girl who has lost all her other property and is any our her father's debts; so you'll never find out it in me where I have put the treasure."

"The away, if you choose," said Tom, coolly; "I'm not all it die. As I said before you shall never learn from me where I have hid the chest."

The leach-comber looked at the young man steadily, a mo-

"You're good grit, and before I kill you, I'll try some of the others."

"Men!" cried Tom, all lressing the prisoners, "mind your-selves, now; and don't let me hear one of you open his lips about that chest."

" Ay, my, sir!" was the unanimous response.

Jones became farious; he turned, glaring upon the captain, and a rain directed his pistol at his head.

You are here!" he exclaimed. "I must end your interter-

He was about to pull the trigger of the pistol, when an empty burnel in one corner of the hold, suddenly was thrown over, disclosing the diminutive figure of Toby Slivers, the naturalist.

13

CHAPTER VI.

TOBY'S STRATAGEM.

THE sight of this unexpected apparition diverted the atten-

"In the name of a thousand Jonalis, where did you come from?" he exclaimed.

"I-I-well, to tell the truth, I have been looking at some very curious specimens of wood-worms on the inside of that barrel," answered Slivers.

"Toby!" cried Tom, reproachfally, "I am affill you were there during all the fighting. Surely, my man, you couldn't see wood-worms in the dark?"

"Yes I could," answered Toby—"because they emit a phosphorescent gleam, which is at once peculiar and ast hisning. See here!

He unstrapped his box from his back, but Tom checked him.

"This is no time for any such display," said he, sternly.
"I suppose you are aware, notwithstan ling your said and daty, that the ship has fallen into the hands of our assaidants?"

Toby hung his head.

"Really, captain," said he, "I would have assisted yet had I been more conversant with the rales of combat; but the truth, I am no fighting man."

A sudden thea seemed to cross the mind of Jones.

He advanced straight to the naturalist, and level 1 like to tol at his head.

"Where is the chest?" cried he; "tell me at oute, or I will blow out your brains!"

Toby turned pale.

" Really-I-I-don't know," he stammered.

"Yes, you do!" cried Jones, in a voice of thundler. "Tell me at once, or-"

A significant click of the pistol implied the rest.

"Not a word, Toby," cried Tom. "I still command my men, though I am prisoner!"

At this the naturalist closed his lips tightly, as if determined not to speak.

"A thousand thunders; this is too much!" roared Jones, taking aim at Tom. "You have said your last say!"

He dicharged his weapon; but the bullet passed over Tom's head. Toly, springing forward, had caught the reacheromber's wrist.

Mach enraged, Jones lifted the pistol to strike the naturalist, when it elatter, holding up both hands, declared that he would tell him where the jewels were deposited.

"No-no-avast there, Toby!" cried Tem. "You must not do that."

The naturalist heeded him not.

"The jeach," sail he, in a distinct voice, "were taken out of the circst, the wood of which had become rotten, and deposited in a cask which you will find in the run, rolled up in many folds of canvas!"

"Ay, ay, now, but you're a pitiful wretch, Toby," cried Tora contemptationsly. "God have mercy upon you, my men, for rolling poor Isabel Morton of her property!"

"The cas's," continued Toby, without seeming to heed the speaker, "is so heavy and so the under barrels and coils of rizging that it will take many men to remove it and get it up."

Tom's eyes flashed the most withering contempt upon the speaker. His shipmates also showed great indignation and gave the intermer three dismal groans.

"This way, my men!" cried the exultant Jones, after he had and feet with ropes; this way I the prize is found!"

He hand taft, followed by the whole gang of beach combers, who, care to behold the treasure, rushed in a body down into the order, provided with lanterns, and thence made their way into the run.

As the last man disappeared, Toby sung out in a distinct

The "This way, steward, now is your time!"

Instantly the steward, who, like Toby, had been hidden luring the whole combat, crawled out of an empty cask " Here—quick—cut my hishings!" cried the naturalist.

The steward obeyed, when Toby, hurrying to the cabin, drew the hatch over the run opening, and fastened it by means of a crowbar, thus in a single instant making priseners of the whole gang of beach-combers!

To return to the fore-hold and inform Tom of what he had done, was the work of an instant. With his kulfe he next severed the lashings of all his shipmates, who now reserve their feet.

"I acknowledge," said Toby, "that I was afraid to fight; but you perceive that I have contrived to bely you."

"Ay, ay, you are better than I thought," said Tom, shaking hands with him.

With his shipmates he now repaired to the cabin, and secured the run hatch with extra fastenings, so as to produce the possibility of the beach-combers osciping. The implienced men howled like enraged tigers when they discovered the trick which had been played them.

"The craft is fixed, anyhow!" cried Jones, "so that you can't get under way, and we can remain here as long as you can. We can set fire to the vessel, as to that matter!"

Tom knew very well that the speaker would not resert to any such desperate measure.

He looked at the clock in the state-room, and quitty informed his men that they might now "turn in," (go to be if they chose, and sleep for a few hoars, as he would have plenty of work for them in the morning.

The forecastle being submergel, the tirel men stretched themselves about the decks, and were soon fast asing. At daylight Tom roused them, and set them to work howing fail casks and other heavy articles from the lower firehold, in order to lighten the ship forward.

The effect of this was soon made apparent. The constant being rolled aft, the ship's head kept gradually risks, will in a few hours her bows were so high out of water, that the life which had been made in her timbers was plainly visible. If hile gangs of men were pumping the ship dry, the corporter, who was an excellent workman, proceeded to require the damage in the bow.

By took of the text day his work was complete! when the articles which had been hoisted from the hold being replace i, the ship's head settled to its proper level, and the vessel was discovered to be perfectly dry.

Tom now proceeded to get up his anchors, and before nightfall he was under way, gliding out of the bay.

A few days later he went into Rio Janeiro, for the double pose of obtaining a cargo of valuable woods, coffee and or, and of surrendering the beach-combers to the proper contities of the town. He was soon rid of the prisoners, were in due course of time were convicted and sentenced to the punishment they deserved.

Tom then weighed anchor, and with a light heart went bowling out of the harbor, homeward bound.

CHAPTER VII.

DIFFICULTIES.

The vessel, when a week out of port, was overtaken by a heavy gale from the north-west. The wind blew great guns, and the seas came rolling, booming and crashing along, sweeping the decks fore and alt. Tom had struck topy dlant masts and yards, had battened down the hatches, lashed the boats securely, and made other preparations for the storm. Nevertheless, the ship lay far down upon her beam-ends; and she in the such furious plunges that many an anxious glance was directed toward the swaying, jerking masts, which every metal secured about to go by the board.

The violence of the gale kept increasing. At dark, Tone was obliged to put his craft before it, and send under bare poles. He had good men in the top, keeping a book-out, but the darkness was so intense that no object could be seen farther than fifteen fathoms shead.

Stillenly one of the men attered an exclamation and pointed a little off the weather-bow.

in a loud voice, "Sail his companion, and immediately added,

The shrill cry was heard through the din of the storm, and Tom came bounding forward. Springing into the fire-rigging, he watched the light with an anxious eye. The stratger was evidently crossing his bows, but it seemed doubt it that she world pass in time to avoid a collision.

"Steady there, as you can go!" shouted the young captain to the helmsman.

"Ay, ay, sir," was the response; but, even as it came, the ship, lifted upon the crest of a tremendous sea, was carried broad with the speed of a rocket.

Far down, in a hollow between the waves, Tom new be-held the dark hull of the stranger, rolling and picking directly ahead of him. He heard the screaming of the other captain and his crew, and thought he could also distinguish from de voices, from which he concluded that the vessel was a passenger craft. The danger of a collision was immurent. Caught in a trough of the sca, it seemed as if the other vessel could not pass in time to escape the Dolphia. Hatid downward by the careering hillow, the latter vessel mast have been dashed against the stranger, but for the ready decision and activity of her young communder. With a capile of bounds, he had already reached the wheel, and now partially sinch as she plunged into the water-valley, which was partially sinch tered from the force of the gale.

As a natural consequence of this maneuver, the Dolphin possed the stranger's stern diagonally, almost escaping her. The crashing of her spanker boom was hearly as the bows of the other craft struck it, snapping it short off, where a grindling, juring noise, with the jingling sound of glass, produced that the two hulls had grazed in a rather topleas of the But for Tom's activity, however, in holling up in the great vessels must have come in direct collision and gone down to gether.

A few hours later the gale slightly above I, when Term I come the close-rected mainsail, and set a double-rectal tracell. The ship was now deshing along at a great rate, role gale ment as much as before, and with a swashing, garding to which indicated the presence of water in her had. Tom therefore ordered the pumps rigged, and very sometheir described clanging was heard. At daylight, when the storm had the circly abated, the carpenter was dispatched to make an examination. He reappeared very soon, repeting that the last reaction seemed to gain nor diminish. In his estimation the last was somewhere in the vicinity of the rudder post, a limit been caused by the collision, but the damage could let be replaced until better weather.

Tota glanced dubiously toward the north-east, where the solliering of a number of gloomy clouds, long and famules, and seemed to proclaim a change of wind, and with it at ther blow. In fact, the change soon took place, when the wind cappe howling along with redoubled fary, tearing the taken-top-sail to shreds before it could be taken in, and carrying the staysail straight up into the air like a balloon.

The water gained rapidly upon the weary men, working at the panaps, and Tom believed that the Dolphin was a doomed craft.

He set the hands to work rizging a raft, dexterously assistis r in and superintentials the work of lashing the timbers has short time the raft was ready, when Tom ordered the halder up of the jewels, which had previously been transtered from the cask to a large chest.

Toby Slivers, with his valuable box strapped to his shoulders, and his blue umbrella under his arm, now came tremain grown the cabin. He was about to fall upon his knees and pray, when Tom or level him to help the hands hunch the rate. This was soon alongside, and the chest of jewels was then carefully lower hand secured to it

Toly then jumped upon the floating platform, and commerce I listing himself to a log.

"Avast there, what are you about?" crist Tom "There's no harry about that; in fact, the ruft may yet weather the gal'; so just come buck here again."

Accordingly Toly end avored to come back, but in such an avalward manner that a bight of one of the rojes holling the rate cangle round him and jerked him overboard between the ship and the flating mass of timiers.

He howled and serective most desmally; in fact, his situation was quite performs, as the rope was slipping up around his neck, to say nothing of the danger of his being jammed. Tom, always ready to help a fellow-creature, jamped upon the raft, and endeavored to disengage the rope from Toky, but all in vain. It was now held so taut by the pitching of the chip that it could not be loosened.

"Cut the rope, men!" shouted the skipper; "there's no help for it!"

A blow from a hatchet severed the strands at once, and freed Toby. Tom hauled him up, when the naturalist, talling i rward, hay for several moments nearly motionless from hight. The captain, thinking he was bally hart, bent auxiously over him, but soon had the satisfaction of seeing him yawn and stretch out his arms. Tom therefore sung out for a rope, which, when thrown to him, he fastened around Toby's breast.

"Heave!" he shouted, and a moment later had the satisfiction of seeing the naturalist pulled aboard. He was about to follow, when a disagreeable accident took place—the parting of the only rope which now held the raft!

A huge set, sweeping over the ship, and relling along to leeward, took up the mass of timbers and carried it replify away in the gathering darkness. Tom saw the ship fell off as the helmsman was ordered to put his wheel up; at the same moment, caught by a counter-sea, the vessel relied plunging fariously, there was a crashing sound, and over went the foremast, top hamper and all, alongside.

The young captain watched the saip until the darkness and distance shut her from his sight; then glanced around him, feeling rather uncomfortable.

"Ay, ay, now, but this is too bad," he said to himself, as he sat down on a log. "I'm afraid I'll never see the ship again."

Then he looked at the carefully lashed chest.

"That's safe, at any rate," he muttered. "Isabel's jewe's!
Mry God carry 'em safe to that beautiful girl, even if I perish!"

There was a piece of chalk in his pecket, and the the plat occurred to him that, as soon as it was light, he would not a Isabel's name and address on the inside of the hill. If he should perish, the chest might possibly full into the hanks of tome honest captain, who would see that it was forwarded to its destination.

The long hours were away. At daylight, Tom felt hungry and tharsty, but, as neither provision nor water had been put on the rail, previous to its drifting clear, he was unable to refresh houself. He looked round him in all directions, but a thick mark covering the agitated waters not far off, limited his vision. The mist finally cleared, but no sign of the Dolphin or of any other craft was visible.

The gale, meanwhile, raging with unabated fury, seemed to e out la dismal knell in his ears. He feared that the Dolphin but your daring the night, and that the only beat in the sip had been swamped, with the crew. Weary, and full of sel forciodines, but endeavoring to keep up his spirits in Frie of all, he lashed himself to a log, and with his heal resting upon the precious chest, soon fell asleep. He slumbered tar ny hours; when he woke it was past noon, and the sun Firm to from an unclouded sky. The gale had gone down consil rilly, and the great seas sparkled in the bright rays as t. cy to set their foaming crests on high. Glancing astern of Li a, Tom now teheld a sail—evidently a topsail schooner bearing down toward him!

His heart bounded for joy; he sprung upon the chest, tossing his cap, in the exuberance of his spirits.

"Ay, ay, now, that's what I call Providence-Providence doing the thing in the right way!" he exclaimed.

Me nwhile, on came the schooner, tearing along through the Water at a great rate.

"Aley, there! Min I you don't run me down!"

A dark-faced man, holding a speaking-trumpet, came to the quarter-rail, and stood looking at Tom without replying.

I'm illy he said something to his men, his main yard was Letiel airck, and a best lowered and manned. When it wci rg-ile of the raft, the captain, who stood in the bow, lea, elignathe phrimman ladd out his hand to Tom.

"How long have you been in this situation?" he inquire!, in what struck the custaway as being a very unpleasant Voice.

The young man explained, not stating, however, that he vas a captain, and the other then informed Lim that his schooner was the Sea-Witch, Captain Crowe, bound from New Orleans to New York, with a load of cotton.

"What have you in that chest?" he carelessly inquired, as the men assisted Tom in transferring it to the beat.

"Sheet-anchor" shrugged his shoulders. He neither liked the question nor the shipper's manner of asking it.

"I decline answering you," he sail, feeling in his police to make sure that the key was there. "Ay, ay, you must is ask me that."

He smiled as he spoke, and so did the stranger copidin, the latter thinking that the chest contained Tom's wardred. This, he thought, was perhaps so scant and diliquidated that the young man did not wish to speak of it. The boat scap was alongside, and the chest hoisted aboard.

"Where is it to go?" inquired one of the men, glancing inquiringly at Captain Crowe.

"I don't know-forward I suppose."

"Ay, ay, forward," answered Tom, thinking it lest to persons a toremast hand. He would stand a letter chance in the forecastle of the contents of the chest being unlike very limit in the cabin. The skipper was evidently of a poping to course disposition, whereas the foremast hands could never reason to suppose that one of their own class would carry any thing more valuable than a few clothes and little "in macks" in his "donkey," (chest.)

Accordingly the latter was stowed away in the forest in when one of the hands, a tall, broad shouldered, have the fellow, officed a part of his bunk to Tom. The years to declined it, saying he would prefer to sleep on top of his circlin calm weather, and in heavy weather belief his

"You're a queer chap," said the mean. "You'll find your bones will suffer some if you sleep in that way."

"A few brukes won't hart me; but I thank you, all the

The man threw himself back, and was soon stering.

Then Tom felt a hand on his shoulder, and terming, bold a grinning lad of seventeen.

"Mow just you look out for that chap," he whiter he "Hold steal every thing of value in your chest if you don't; he's a thief."

"He looks like one," answered Tom, surveying the man's great red nose, which projected above the side of the bunk.

do-

"If you've anything in the way of grog in your chest, you'll continued the lad, with an inquiring glance, directed toward the "donkey."

"I have no diling in the way of greg, youngster," suswered Ton, " but I was going to ask you if you had. I've fasted I've a time, do you see, and would like a few drops to 18-fresh me."

The ley said he had no liquer; but he at once proceeded to the adily and proceed some good, strong coffee, with a less the classest and potatoes, which he promptly placed before the castaway.

Total the ited the lad, and ate heartily. An hour after, he west on deck, and mounting into the fore-rise is a looked to see if he could yet discover any sign of the, I) lphin or her her. He could not all he descended to the deck with a heavy sigh.

"I'm min," sing out the captain, " have you had any thing to eat?"

"Well, j steeme afthere, then, and coll up this main-brace.

If you est, you must expect to work."

"My dear sir," answered Tom, "I thank you with all my leart to the meal I have had, but, do you see, I am able to I y for my passage, and would therefore prefer going in your Craft as the estle passenger."

The skipper's eyes twinkled.

"I 's all richt," said he, "aithough I must own that it seems rich et all it come entant a sailor turn. " passenger! Ho, he !"

"I think it's nature l," answered Tom, "that a man like me, Etalie men' i romee in his lin."

Spisipilandi creck! was hearlable.

Give in paper To a at once perceived that one of the foretive leaves had part I the sheet, and that the curves was foreigned about in a way which therefore had to just the yard leave. If not secured, the canvas, although it was new and of good finish, must be torn to shreds.

" Hard up with that wheel !" reared the skipper.

" Hard down with that wheel!" shouted Tom, forgetting, under the impulse of the moment, that he was aboard another man's vessel.

The helmsman, instinctively cleying the cheery voice of the young captain, had actually begun to just his ward it was before the angry eyes of his own skipper warm. I him to move it the other way.

"Now, then, what in the name of Bedz habit do you have by giving orders abound my craft?" exclaimed Cowe, and vancing toward the castaway.

"It was a mistake of mine," answered Tom. "I forzy where I was. It would have been befor, the till, if your put your wheel down, as you will soon see"

The speaker was right. A puff of while each by the sel, as the schooner fell off, tore it from the yell and carried it away to leeward.

The men soon had another on deck, and were zero on tendy. Tom took a step or two aft, while the interned helping them, when he sublen'y remember 1 to the way as passenger; so, putting his hands in his policies and warstill z, he returned forward.

Just then, glancing through the scattle into the forcestle, Tom saw one of the watch below—the man who had have him to share has bunk—very basy inspecting the valuable chest, and endeavoring to pear through a crack in the slike of it. The fellow seemed much interested, and his eyes show like beetles! Could a be possible, Tem theorem, that he had guessed the contents of the chest?

He watched the man narrowly, and finally saw is the crowbar and cadeaver to pay up the lill. This was the factor for the young captain's patience.

"Why, you miserable hasher, what are you did to the trying to open an houset man's chest? What doy has a " desi Tom a thew on the lead, this by the craw or as it to about what you've seen, or it'll be the werse for you. My name's Carrel!

And springing into the foreastle, he can be the think who grinned and showed his teeth.

"Upon my word," replied Tom, " you are the most impudent thief I ever Leard of!" So saying, he wrenched the crowbar from the man's hand, by a sudden skillful movement.

"If I ever catch you meddling with my chest agric," said he, "I'll tie a rope around you and have you towed overboard."

The man drew his knife, evidently hoping thus to indinite Tom, who, however, told him to put the weapon back in a sheath, or he would crack his skull like a nut.

With a sellen frown, the fellow sheathed his knife, and the tering something about being even with Tom yet, retired to a corner.

Sallenly, he looked up and grinned.

"See here!" he exclaimed; "d'ye suppose I was in earnest a'ent what I dbl? "D'ye suppose I care for a few old c'othes, such as is in that denkey? I've clothes enough of my own, I hope. I knowed you was watching me, and so made believe, just to see how you'd act, that I wanted to open the chest."

Tom, however, gwessed that this was mere pretense, judging that the man really suspected there was semething very valuable in the chest, and he ther fore resolved to be on the that, at all times, during the passage.

Toward night the side abouted considerably, and the seas went down. There was a full moon, she like a clear, soft light ever all objects, and Tom could make out the gloom of a white sail off the weather bow. He was finally stretched at full length near the fore-hatch, looking up at the white, swelling canvas, and reflecting as to the five of the Dolphin and her crew, when he noticed the schooner's foremast hands—ten men in all—guthered forward of the win thas, convers it is now tones.

He was quite certain he heard the word "chest" several times repeated, and therefore, believing that the conversation and reference to his property, he raised his head to be ten. The sallors, perceiving the movement, instantly stopped talkers, and began catclessly walking the dicks. Tom had no do it now as to what had been the sall of their convertation, and he resolved to keep a still more vigilant watch con his chest.

He stationed himself near the scuttle, and, folling his arms, quietly turned his gaze upon the giant Conclude was lounging near the haid-theads. Now and then his avides remainst his hand on his jacket, as if he there half so and zery precious, and the young captain at once equal to I that it was either a knife, a pistol, or a bottle of greg.

6

"Hallon there, mate!" exclaimed the custaway, "what a that you have under your jacket?"

The man colored, and seemed a little confrs. 1.

"Oh, nothing particular," he answered. "Nothing but to staceo. Will you have a chew?"

" No, thank you," answered Tom; "I don't use it."

Believing that Carrel had spoken the truth-frefall lixiries at sea tobacco is esteemed the greatest-Tem U. Lit no more upon the matter, but concluded that he would go below, and just take a look at his property, to see if it was all night. Accordingly, he descented into the for easily, and by the light of the swaying lamp, enerally inspects I the lack of the chest. Ghad to perceive that it had not yet been the per ! with, he was about to turn away, when he saw a sine w fail upon the lid before Lina. He looked up qui lilu, and a last a glumpse of an evil-looking face, as it was with brown in a the opening in the scuttle. Although he half sen it ! : in instant, yet be felt quite certain it was Carrel's He spira to the foot of the helder, and was aseen ling qui hir - . . . . . . . fact, nearly reached the opening-when a leavy line in his head, from a lemmer, or some other is the contract, he are Lim almost senscless from his position. He is it is willy, it the shock of the fall did him good, by partially is a rehim his haif-benumbed factities. Hest get 1 to his her to confront Currel, who was prepairs to deal limit the w, with a heavy conjer's hammer grasjed in his read in

But for the top lining of Tom's cap hing the lapt of the with cotton, the first blow he had received in state and have deprived him of all sense and motion. We'll know a the a second would have that effect, in space of the pair of the young man, weakered as he was, at our state of the pair int, as I emissed him by the threat with the last the state he upraised arm with the other. Then, the zinst pair he he gave the relief such an off clive how in the samuel that the wretch fairly graped for breath

In fact, the victory must have been won by Tom, but for the interference of several men, two of whom threw the young captain backward, while a third proceeded to tie his arms with strong cords, and to gaz him with a pump-bolt

The giant raised the lammer to strike the prostrate man, but one of the sailors now intoposed.

"No use of shed ling blood," said he. "There's no need of it. The chap is fixed so that he can't trouble us."

The man turned away with a sullen growl of dissatisfaction, and snatching a crowbar from the hands of one of his chipmates, he proceeded at once to pry open the lid of the chest.

Tom's heart swelled almost to bursting with indignation.

"Ay, ay, now," he exclaimed, mentally, "is it possible that this precious prize that I've had so much trouble to procure is now to be taken away? that Isabel is to lose her property—the means of—"

An exclamation of unbounded delight from the thicf, who had now broken open the lid, interrupted the captain's reflections.

The reliber's eyes fairly seemed to snap with greedy exult-sight.

"I told you, hads," he said, addressing his shipmates, "that the chest was too heavy to hold nothing but a sailor's toggery. Besides, I saw the gleam of these things, though I didn't think then they were jewels, when I pried up the lid tother watch with my knife."

The rest of the crew now came into the forecastle. They crowded round the chest, gesticulating and uttering exclamations of delight.

"Stand aside," said Currel, "and let us divide these pretty things. Of course, as I've had the most trouble in the matter, the biggest share belongs to me, do you see."

"We don't see any thing of the kind!" exclaimed a ship-

m. e'e; " the shares must be even."

"No, no; the biggest part belongs to us four," said another, himself and three of his companious. "We planted " whole affair."

The conspirators could not agree, and angry words followed. From words the party came to blows, and their shouts and shricks, as they fought, resounded through the forceastle. One of the disputants, falling against the chest, the lid closed with a click; at the same moment the captain and his mates, armed with revolvers, came rushing into the forecastle.

"What's the meaning of this?" the skipper angilly exchimed. "Have I not told you again and again that there must be no fighting in my craft?"

The combatants, bloody and disfigured, at once storged their work, and stood looking confusedly from one to the other.

"What is the cause of the quarrel?" continued the captain, not a little surprised to see Tom lying gagged and bound.

"Well, the fact is," sail Correl, who, like the rest of his shipmates, did not care that the skipper, who was a very avaricious man, should know about the treasure, "the fact is that—that—do you see, this man" (pointing to Tom) "wanted to have some grub that the cook had made for our treakfist. He wanted to eat it now, and some of the men side! with him. As he insisted in the matter, a few of us threw him down and served him as you see. The rest, offerir resistance, we have had a fight, sir, which we couldn't help."

"So this man," said Captain Crowe, looking at Tom, "is the cause of the trouble! You've treated him wrong, though, for all that, as he's a passenger, and means to pay wall for the passage. Don't let me ever hear of your acting so ar in;

if I do, I'll have you all seized up and flogged."

The men were quite satisfied with the way in which Carrel had deceived the skipper, and not one opened his lips to contradict the statement made. As to Tom, they believed he would not do so, either, as he would not care to let the avaricious captain know about his treasure. Some words drapped by the young man, soon after he came aboard, had convenied them that he at once divined the grasping nature of Crowe.

The latter now unfastened the cords with which Tem was tied, and relieved him of the gag.

"You had better take up your quarters in the calin." said he. "You seem to be always hangry, and this will get you into another quarrel with my men, if you stry here."

"Hungry!" cried Tom, rubbing his bruised head. " Well, now, I don't know about that! I-"

His glance fell upon his chest, and he remained silent.

"I will remove to the cubin at once," he said, after a moment's parise, "if you will order some of your hands to carry my chest."

The men exchange I glances, and looked much disappointed. There was no help for it, however, for the captain now give the required order, and the hands were obliged to carry the chest into the state-room. Tem then procured ropes, and fistened the 111 down securely, lashing the chest to a couple of ringbolts.

The captain and all his officers excepting the one who had the war h, and who had been first asleep during the disturbance, now retire i to their ber'ls.

As for Tom he could not sleep. He felt quite unersy regar day the chest, for he doubted not that Currel and his companies, somer tain to bestheir prize altogether, would Speak of the treasure to the skipper, and make some agreement with him as to taking possession of, and shoring it. He was still have ling over the matter, when drylight erept upon the sea.

"S.il 'O!" criftl a clear voice on deck. Tom sprung through the companion, to behold the Dolphin secreely two ships bergins astern, and to comprehend that it was her sail which Le it el seen on the previous evening, gleaming in the moon-is the wester how.

To spring upon the round-house and wave his hat was the Work of a moment. He was at care recognized, and the best bing lowered, was soon alongsile the schooler. Tom [ il the samper of the schooler as he had agreed to do, for his Instage, which I chily bull proved such a short one. Crone was supplied on discovering that Tem was the Dolphin's captain, and apply to I for not having problem his make bef re. The young man said it was no consequence, and strung after his process chest, which, to the intense mortification of the schooner's hands, had been already lowered into the boat.

Soon after, Tom was aboard his own slip, relating his adventures to his mate. The latter then stated that he had contrived to stop the leak near the Dolphin's stern-post wird some pieces of canvas, until the sterm aband, when the carpenter easily repaired the damage. The mate had also continued getting up a new topmest in place of the one upon had been carried away. The men were land at work as now.

"We have all been worrying so much a out y a," coating ued the mate, that I am afraid we have made hat links paragress as yet. We concluded that we should never see class you or your precious chest again; for yesterday, j st be receiving, we fell in with the ratt, and believed that you water your property, had been washed away from it."

The captain shook hands with his mate, and thanked heartily for his kind sympathy, after which he went blow to get some sleep.

The ship, me in while, lowled merrily upon her care, to men working away at the new top mast with ghal hears, new that Tom, their gail int captain, was restored to them.

Two mouths later he was anchored off Liver, of, when, among the first who boar led him from shore was his old fire ! Tark.

"Ay, ay, now, my old claim, it does my heart good to see you!" cried honest Tem. "How is—how is—"

" Well?' sail Turk, thrusting both hands into his pockets

" How is-is- You know-"

Turk's countenance fell.

" Lively-nothing has hop; or of to her?"

"Ay, ay, she's gene," answere! Tark, deleftly.

Tom grew deally pale, and clotelied his riendly the arm

"Ay, ay, now," he graned, "this is too ind. Turk-Turk-I never can bear it."

"You must," said Tark, turning his eyes to windward, perhaps to hide a tear, "you must hear it as I have I to !"

" You?"

"Ay, ay, I r'ally got attached to her, d'ye see. I had put a new cout of paint on her, and made every thing ships as a when we ran on the Scilly Rocks, and that was the last of her."

"What are you talking about ?"

"Why, the coal-schooner, of course. Blast it, man, if I ever thought I could get to loving any thing so much with only two masts!"

"I was speaking of Isabel."

" Suchmelances a ters cases!" districted Turk, throwing his quit overboard. "If it was she you were speaking of, Big, if it was she, do you see, she isn't gone like the schooner, doegh she's like to go in abdirt by."

"Expiringonisch, Tark. Herverherd, for Gol's sike!"

"Wed, then, you hathir been good three months, when as hat a looking chap as ever I set my eyes on-as noble-looki. r. salad - gats to calling on Isabel at the brick house."

" Who was he?"

"Can't tell that; but one thing, d'ye see, is qu'te plain. Is. I ain't got any objection to his callin' on her, seein' as It's a lover, I should s j, will to y'll get spilled soon, too, I'm pretty sartain; so y will but relive up all thoraids of her, and turn your mind to a ne one in your own way of life."

That I del against the rad for support, and heaved a sigh.

Then held out his hand to Tank.

"It's all up with me," sail her "I'll never think of weman ation I belth whit of a tiling down, but that i lea is done With now,"

That very day the jewels were sent to the astorished Isa-1.1. Took, following the carner, who carried the load into the lives, expediment matters in a few words.

"And I - Unt make Captain Tem -has been to all this

tro. ' 's for ma?' eried the young glil, blas ing decady.

" Ay, and medi more la defer you, miam; any thing n the weill that property, answered Trik.

Wiring to be. It his can all it could, be then explain-el almit the book heat trick of the most This.

Is, in I was still more supplied. Her heart heat fast; smiles and blashes coursel out other over her face.

"Tell the equal I should have to see him to-morrow, tothat had," she said, souly. "Tell hid, also, that the trea-9 tre has come at a very good time, as I have all along been v-ry-very poor."

Turk conveyed the message to Tom, who made his appearance, neatly attired, before Is thel the next morning.

There was another person in the room; the young man who had lately called so often upon the young girl. He was a tall, military-hooking person ago, of thirty-five, with a many triumed mustable, pleasant free, and clear blue eyes.

Is bed introduced him as the late Mr. Mortals permand bother, captain in the —themhatry, just returned to a terical service. The young man baving hearl, through a friend, or I abel's loss and pecuniary troubles, had, on arriving at Larerpool, hastened to her assistance.

Now Tom's whole countenance lighted up with joy, and no gave the captain's hand a true "sailor grip."

After a few moments' conversation, the sol lier left the room. Tom's old bashf doess then came upon him; he colored and was much confused.

"How can I ever repay you for what you have done for me?" said Isabel, softly.

He looked at her, and reading coy encouragement in her eyes, he lost control of himself, and hurriedly stammered cut his love for her.

Then he drew back as if frightened at what he had done, and turned as if to leave her.

"I have gone too far," he sail, much confisel. "Hw dared I think that you—that you could return the laye of a rule senfaing man like me? I have make a follow a year on the knob of the door.

"You are mistiken," answered Is del, in a voice so really above a whisper. "Stay," and she endcavored to chep his good arm with her they white hands; "I love you, a cle captain—I loved you from the first!"

Almost intoxicated with joy, Sheet-anchor Tem covered the blushing face with kisses.

" Mine-mine at last !"

He held her in his arms and boked down upon her dro pring lids with a world of love and passion in his great cycs.

There is not much more to all.

The lovers were married two months after Tom's return.
The jewels brought a hundred thousand dollars, with part of which Isabel paid her father's debts. As Sheet-anchor Temhad ten thousand dollars hid up in an American bank, he was able to contribute a mite toward filling up the gap left by the payment alluded to.

He repaired to America with his happy wife, and purchas a next residence on the outskirts of New York city, where the takin now reside, happy and contented.

Toly Slivers, who continues to "grub" for worms, small. Itterdies, bredes and other insects, visits them every time h

Captures a "curiosity."

Tark also visits them at long intervals. He still follows the gea, and often takes pleasure in relating to his shipmates the story of Sheet-Anchor Tom.

STANDARD DIME DIALOGUES

For School Exhibitions and Home Entertainments.

Nos. I to 21 inclusive. 13 to 25 Popular Dialogues and Dramas in each book. Easi volume 100 12mo pages, sent post-paid, on receipt of price, ten cents.

Beadle & Adams, Publishers, 98 William St., N. Y.

These volumes have been prepared with especial reference to their availability for Exhibitions, rang adapted to schools and parlors with or without the familiare of a range, and suited to SCHOL ARS AND YOUNG PEOPLE of every sue, both male and female. It is fair to assume that no other books in the market, at any price, contain so many useful and available dialogues and dramas. I wit, pature, humor and sentiment.

DIME DIALOGUES, NO. 1.

Meeting of the Muses. For nine young ladies. Baiting a Live Englishman. For three boys. Tuest's Cormation. For male and female. Eashion. For two ladies. The Rehearsal. For six boys. Which will you Choose? For two boys. The Queen of May. For two little girls. The Tea-Farty. For four ladies.

The Mission of the Spirits. Five young ladies.

Hobnobbing. For five speakers. The Secret of Success. For three speakers. Young America. Three males and two females. Josephine's Destiny. Four females, one wale, The Folly of the Duel. For three male speakers. Dogmatiam. For three male speakers The Ignorant Confounded. For two by The Fast Young Men. For two males. Three Scenes in Wedded Life. Maleand female. The Year's Reckoning. 12 females and 1 males Mrs. Sniffles' Confession. For male and female. The Village with One Gentleman, For eight in makes and one male.

DIME DIALOGUES, NO. 2.

The Genius of Liberty. 2 males and I female. Doing Good and Saving Bad. Several characters. A Sensation at Last. For two modes. The Golden Rule. Two males and two ismales. The Gift of the Fairy Queen. Several females, Taken is and Done For. For two characters. The Country Aunt's Vis t to the City. For soveral characters. The Two Romans. For two males. Trying the Characters. For three males. The Happy Family, For several animals," The Rainbow, For several characters.

How to Write ' Popular' Stories. Two males. The Greenhorn. For two males, The Three Men of Science. For four males. The Old Lady's Will. For tour males, The Little Phil sophers. For two little girls. How to Find an Heir. For five males. The Virtues. For six young ladles. A Connubial Eclogue. The Public meeting. Five males and one female. The English Traveler. For two males.

DIALOGUES, NO. 3.

The May Queen. For an entire school. Press Ref ron Convention. For ten females. New ing Bed Company. A Fores, Fortice males. The Two Romans. For two males. Courting Under Difficulties. 2 males, 1 female. National Representatives. & Burlesque, 4 males, Showing the White Feather. 4 males, I fem-la-Escaping the Draft. For numerous males.

The Genteel Cook. For two males. Masterplece. For two males and two fema on. The Same. Second scene. For two males. The Battle Call. A Recitative. For one male,

DIME DIALOGUES, NO. 4. The Frest King. For ten or more versons. The Stubb'stown Volunteer. 2 males, 1 female, Starting in Life. Three males and two females. A Scene from " Paul Pry." For Your minles. Faith, Hope and Charity. For three little girls. I'ms Charmes. For three males and one temple. Darby and Joan. For two mules and one female. Bee, Clock and Broom, For three little girls. The May. A Sloral Paney. For six litt e girls The Enchanted Princess. 2 males, several families " on r to Whom Hon r is Due. 7 males, I female Gentie Client. For several males, and female | The Heward of Benevalence. Lot tum maior. Populary. A Discussion. For twenty males, The Letter, For two males,

The light Way. A Collegov. For two Love. What the Lodger Says. Fir two males. The Crimes of Dress. A Collegue. For two by

DIALOGUES, NO. 5.

The Three Gresses. For second or parlor, Dontlement. A " Three Person ! " Fa rr. Bull d the Curtain. For males and females. The Ets Pi Society. Five boys and a teacher. Examinatio Day, Forseveral female characters. Trading in " Frape" Forseveral males. The School Boys Tribanal. For ten boys. A Longe Tangue. Several males and females. How Not to Get an Answer. Por two females.

Putting on Air. A Collegue. For two males. The Straight M rk. For several boys. Two ideas of Life. A Colleguy. For ten girls Extract from Marine Fallere. Matry-Money. An Ac I g Charale. The Six Virtues. For ix young ladies. The Irishman at Home. For two males, Fashionable Requirements. For three piels. A Bery of I's (Eyes). For eight or less little girls ha Way They Kept a Secret. Male and females. The Post under Difficulties. For five males. William Tell. For a whole school, Woman's Rights Seven females and two males. All is not Gold that Clitters. Male and females. "he Generous Jew. For six males. - Score For three males and one female.

DIALOGUES, NO. 6.

The Two Connectors. For three males, The Vataries of Fully For a number of females. tunt Betsy's Beaux. Four females and two males. The Libel Suit. For two females and one male. Santa Claus. For a number of boys. Christmas Fairles. For several little girla. The Tases Ricgs. For two makes.

Dime School Series-Dialogues.

DIME DIALOGUES, No. 20.

Pice wrong man. Three males and three females | An air castle. For five males and three females | Attenuous caris. For two little girls. | City manners and country hearts. For three girls. No l'e present. For four boys. Judge not. For teacher and several scholars. Telling dreams. For four little folks. For two boys. Mistaken identity. Two males and three femal a. Reeping bounders. Two fem les and three males. Undda't read English. For 3 males and I semale. A cure for good. One indy and two gentlement A little Vesuvius. For six little girls. " Sold." For three boys.

City manners and country hearts. For three girls and one boy. The ailly dispute. For two girls and teacher. Not one there! For four male characters. Foot-print. For numerous character . The credulous wise-acre. For two males, t macessed donation party. For several, de of daht out of danger. For three maies and Cind rella. For several children. three females. Little Rad Riding Hood. For two children. I we see made lil n propose. A doct, In house on the hil. For four females. Tvidones groug . For two mules. Worth and wealth. For four females, Waterfall. For several.

DIME DIALOGUES, No. 21.

Mark Hustings' return. For four males. Too much for Aust Matilda. For three for Wit against wie. Three females and one . A sudden recovery. For three males. The double stratagem. For lour females, Counting chickens before they were hatched For four males.

DIME DIALOGUES, No. 22.

The Dark Cupid; or, the mistakes of a morning. Titunia's banquet. For a number of girls. For three gentleme a and two bidles. That Ne'er do-well; or, a brother's lesson. For A rainy day; or, the school-garl philosophers. two males and two females. High art; or the new mania For two girls. Strange adventures. For two boys. The king's supper. For four girls. A practical exemplification. For two boys. Monsieur Thie s in America; os, Yankee ve. The little Sector. For two tiny girls. Frenchman. For four boys, Direy's diplomacy. 3 females and incidentals. A May day. For three little gir s. A Frenchman; or, the outwitted aunt. For two From the sublime to the ridiculous. For 14 maisadies and one gentleman.

Boys will be Loys. For two boys and one girl. For three young ladges, God is love. For a number of acholars, The way be managed, For 2 males, 7 females. Fandango. Various characters, white and other WINE. A sweet revenge. For four boys. Heart not ince. For five boys.

DIME DIALOGUES, No. 23.

Rhods Hunt's remedy. For 3 fe unles, I male. Hans Schmidt's recugment. For two males. Cheery and Gramble. For two Little boys. The phentom dongunate. For six females. Does it pay! For six males. Company manners and home impoliteness. two males, two females and two children. The glad days. For two little boys. Unfortunite Mr. Brown. For I male, 6 females. Ignorance va. justice. For eleven males. l'au real cost. For two girls.

A bear garden. For three males, two females. The busy bees. For four I ttle girls. Checkmate. For numerous characters. School time. For two little girls Death scene. 2 principal characters and adjuncts. For Dross and gold. Several characters, undersand for Configured Miller. For three males, two females. Pedants all. For four famules.

DIME DIALOGUES, No. 24.

The god less of liberty. For nine young ladies. for three graces. For three little girls. fire music director. For seven males, A strange a-cret. For three girls. Au anjust man. For four males. The shop g d's v'etory. I mule, & fomntes. The parchametiner. 2 gentlemen, 2 ladies. Mean is no word for it. For four ladies. Wai usical. A number of charact's, both sexes. Signatud are the peaceunikers, Seven young girls.

The six lance men. For six hors. Have you heard the news! The true queen. Two young girle. A slight mistake. 4 maios ) terms a and several auxiliaries. Lozy and busy. Ten little Gliews. The old and young. I gentleman, I sittle girt That postal card. Shalles and I gentleman. Mother Gorse and her boundeda, A will sennol farey dress dialogue and towerte.

The societies of the delectables and les miserthins. For two lalles and two gentlemen. (V intench would have, 6 little boys & teacher.) han him through the clouds. For four ladies, The triend in need. For four males. The angra. For twelve little girls, In doors and out. For five little boys. Dingbate. For one make and four famales. The pound of desh. For three hove. hewars of the predillers. 7 mized characters. Good words. For a number of boys, A friend. For a number of little girls.

The true use of wealth. For a whole school, Gamester. For numerous characters. Put yourself lu bis place. For two boys. Little wise bends. For four little girls. The regenerators. For five have Crabinee's woning. Several characters. Integrity the base of all surcess. Two makes A stroked way made straight. One grations Bud noe ludy. How to "break in " young hearts. Two laller and one gentlemen.

If The above books are sold by Newad-alers everywhere, or will be seen post-pold, in any ectrons, on receipt of price, 10 st ats each.

BEADLE & ADAMS, Publishers, 95 William St., N. Y.

TWO NEW BOOKS

Exhibitions and Home Entertainments.

DIME DIALOGUES No. 23.

Rhoda Hunt's Remedy. A Domestic "Experience." For three females and one male. By Dr. Louis Legrand.

Hans Schmidt's Recommend. An Active Colloquy. For two males.

By Orange Lemon, Ph. D.

Cheery and Grumble. A Rhymed Duet. For two little Boys. By Rose Kennedy.

The Phantom Doughnuts. A Very Domestic Dialogue. For six females. By Frank S. Finn.

Does it Pay? A "Base-ball" Confession, with a moral. For six males. By Major Wagstaff.

Company Manners and Home Impoliteness. A Society Drama. For two males, two females and two children. By Miss Grace Grafton.

The Glad Days. A New Year Greeting. For two little boys. By Cyril Deane.

Unfortunate Mr. Brown. A Dramatic Predicament. For one male and six females. By Miss Lillian Victor.

The Real Cost. A Home Lesson. For two girls. By Cousin Alice.

A Bear Garden. A Dramatic Morality. For three males and two females. By Chas. D. Elkins.

The Busy Bees. For four little girls. By Miss Minnie Coleman.

Checkmate. An Acting Charade and Parlor Exhibition Drama. For numerous characters. By S. Annie Frost.

School-Time. For two little girls.

By Miss Nellie Homan.

Death Scene. From Dr. Faustus. A celebrated scene for high dramatic effort. For two principal characters and several adjuncts.

Dross and Gold. A Country-Life and Home Scene. For several characters, male and female. By author of "California Uncle," "Mrs. Jonas Jones," "The Wrong Man," etc., etc.

Confound Miller. A Dramatic Joke. For three males and two females.

By Miss H. S. Sperry.

Ignorance vs. Justice. A School Scene. For eleven males. By Frank H. Craight.

Pedants All. A Stage Episode. For four males.

DIME FUNNY SPEAKER, No. 21.

The funniest things of the funniest writers, and numerous original and adapted pieces expressly prepared for the work.

dates,

Clory Mit Ter Sthars und Sthripes,

Terence O'Dowd's Patriotism,

The Lime Kiln Club Oration.

Farmer Thornbush on Fools,

The Fiddler,

The Regular Season, The School Boy's Lament. Dot Baby Off Mine, Bluggs Once More, Views on Agriculture, One Hundred Years Ago, De 'Sperience ob de Rebrend Quacko

Strong, A Dollar or Two, On Some More Hash, Professor Dinkelspelgelman on the Origin of Life, Konsentrated Wisdum, Joseph Brown and the Mince Pie,

Jenkins's Ser-John mon,

A Foggy Day, "Tell Me Ye Winged Winds," The New Mythology, (Vulcan,) The New Mythology,

(Pan,) The New Mythology, (Bacchus,)

I Kin Nod Trink To-

Nighd, The New Church Doctrine,

Watermil-Wilyum's lion,

Colonel Sellers Eluci- | Where Money is King, | Josiah Axtell's Ora-

Parson Barebones's Anathema,

Cæsar Squash on Heat, Fritz Valdher is Made a Mason,

Joan of Arc. The Blessings of Farm Life,

The People, Thermopylee,

Cats, Jim Bludso; or, the Prairie Belle,

A Catastrophic Ditty, The Maniac's Defense, Woman, God Bless Her!

Be Miserable, Dodds versus Daubs, The Cadi's Judgment, That Calf.

The above books are sold by Newsdealers everywhere, or will be sent, post-paid, to any address, on receipt of price, 10 cents each.

BEADLE & ADAMS, Publishers. 98 William St., N. Y.

Beadle's New Dime Novels.

PUBLISHED SEMI-MONTHLY.

In this new series of the popular favorites, "the Incomparable Dime Novels," are presented only the best works of the most entertaining American writers, given in the usual size and form, but with illuminated covers. Lovers of romance of American life, character and history will find in these novels an unending source of delight. The following are already issued:

322 Old Grizzly. 323 Dashing Dragoons. 324 Will-o'-the Wisp.
325 Dashing Dick.
326 Old Crossfire.
327 Ben Bramble.
328 Brigand Captain.
329 Old Strategy.
320 Gray Hair, Chief.
321 Prairie Tigers.
322 Rival Hunters.
323 Texan Scout.
324 Will-o'-the Wisp.
325 Dashing Dick.
326 Montbars, Scourge.
327 The Green Ranger.
328 Montbars, Scourge.
329 Metamora.
320 Thornpath, Trailer.
320 Thornpath, Trailer.
321 Foul-weather Jack.
322 The Black Rider.
323 The Helpless Hand.
324 The Lake Rangers.
325 The Helpless Hand.
326 Dingle, the Outlaw,
327 Helpless Ship.
328 Montbars, Scourge.
329 Metamora.
320 Thornpath, Trailer.
320 The Lake Rider.
321 The Twin Trailers,
322 The Black Arrow.
323 The Lake Rider.
324 The Lake Rangers.
325 The Helpless Hand.
326 Death's Head Ranger.
327 Captain of Captains.
328 Texan Scout.
328 Phantom Horseman.
339 The Blue Band.
330 The Squaw Chief.
330 The Squaw Chief.
331 The Helpless Hand.
332 Rival Hunters.
333 Texan Scout.
334 Zebra Zack.
335 Silent Shot.
336 Dingle, the Outlaw,
3410 Blackhawk.
3412 Black Arrow.
3413 The Lost Captain.
3414 The Lost Captain.
3415 The Twin Trailers,
3416 Death's Head Ranger.
3417 Captain of Captains.
3418 The Warrior Princess.
3418 The Blue Band.
3419 The Blue Band.
3419 The Blue Band.
3420 The Squaw Chief. 335 Masked Messenger. 836 Morgan, the Pirate. 337 The Boy Spy. 338 Tahle, the Trailer. 339 The Boy Chief. 340 Tim, the Trailer. 383 The Specter Skipper. 341 Red Ax, the Giant. 342 Stella, the Spy. 385 The Hunchback. 343 White Avenger. 344 The Indian King. 345 The Long Trail. 346 Kirk, the Guide, 347 The Phantom Trail. 348 The Apache Guide. 349 The Mad Miner. 350 Keen-eye, the Ranger. 351 Blue Belt, the Guide. 351 Blue Belt, the Guide.
352 On the Traii.
353 The Specter Spy.
354 Old Bald-head.
355 Red Knife, the Chief.
358 Sib Cone, Trapper.
359 Blue Anchor.
397 Quadroon Spy.
398 Black Rover.
398 Black Rover.
399 Red Belt. 357 The Bear-Hunter. 358 Bashful Bill, the Spy. 359 The White Chief. 360 Cortina, the Scourge. 361 The Squaw Spy. 369 Scout of '76.

363 Spanish Jack.

364 Masked Spy.

365 Kirke, the Renegade. | 408 Red Dan. 366 Dingle, the Outlaw, 378 Silent Shot. 379 The Phantom Ship. 380 The Red Rider. 381 Grizzly-Hunters. 382 The Mad Ranger. 384 The Red Coyote. 386 The Black Wizard. 387 The Mad Horseman. 393 Red Slayer. 393 Red Slayer. 394 The Phantom Foe. 400 The Two Trails. 401 The Ice-Fiend. 402 The Red Prince. 403 The First Trail. 404 Sheet-Anchor Tom. 405 Old Avoirdupois. 406 White Gladiator. 407 Blue Clipper.

409 The Fire-Eater. 421 The Flying Scout. 422 Sonora Ben. 423 The Sea King. 424 Mountain Gid. 425 Death-Trailer. 426 The Crested Serpent. 427 Arkansas Kit. 428 The Corsair Prince. 429 Ethan Allen's Rifles. 430 Little Thunderbolt. 388 Privateer's Bride.
389 Jaguar Queen.
390 Shadow Jack.
391 Eagle Plume.
392 Ocean Outlaw.
431 The Falcon Rover.
432 Honest Hand.
433 The Stone Chief.
434 The Gold Demon.
435 Eutawan, the Slayer. 436 The Masked Guide. 437 The Conspirators. 438 Swiftwing, the Squaw. 439 Caribou Zip. 440 The Privateer. 441 The Black Spy. 442 The Doomed Hunter. 443 Barden, the Ranger. 444 The Gray Scalp. 445 The Peddler Spy. 446 The White Canoe. 447 Eph Peters. 448 The Two Hunters. 449 The Traitor Spy.

The following will be issued in the order and on the dates indicated: 450-The Gray Hunter. By Edward Willett. Ready October 28th.

451-Little Moccasin. By John Neal. Ready November 11th.

452-The White Hermit. By W. J. Hamilton. Ready November 25th.

453-The Island Bride. By Roger Starbuck. Ready December 9th.

454-The Forest Princess. By Jos. E. Badger, Jr. Ready December 23d.

455-The Trail Hunters. By Edward S. Ellis. Ready January 6th.

456-The Backwoods Banditti. By Edward Willett. Ready January 20th. 457-Ruby Boland, the Girl Spy. By Frederick Whittaker. Ready Feb. 10th.

BEADLE'S DIME NOVELS are always in print and for sale by all newsdealers; or will be sent, post-paid, to any address: single numbers, ten cents; six months (13 Nos.) $1.25; one year (26 Nos.) $2.50. Address, BEADLE AND ADAMS, Publishers, 98 William St., N. Y.